Hello, sorry for saying I wanted to destroy Youtube and MTV, just so someone didn't make a full song of Neil's Anthem and post it online or even worse, send it to a massive record company. If that happened, I could possibly get in trouble for spreading a song that wasn't mine and get involved with a never ending legal dispute. But look on the bright side, at least I don't want to bankrupt huge organisations out of malice. You know when criminals say 'it's nothing personal' to soften the blow? The same thing is happening, here. Also… Six seveeeeeen! I had to say that, didn't I? However, I realise how bad this article sounds: 'Let's destroy MTV and Youtube! Six seveeeeen!!!' I sound like the most obnoxious person imaginable. It was just a misunderstanding, that's all. Now that I think of it, saying the nonsense and hyperactive number-based phrase is fitting for few if any apologies. Even if things are on the lower end of the scale, the phrase is highly inappropriate. Say someone bumps into your car causing mild damage, how would you feel if the person responsible said 'six seeeeeeven!' afterwards? Going to the other extreme, those convicted of murders should never say how sorry they are in court and then shout the number whilst pulling an excited face. I would say my apology is somewhere in the middle of the two cases. Could be worse, could be better but it's STILL bad. So, sorry!

What makes this apology even weirder is the fact I visit Youtube all the time and I enjoy it. But you can see how desperate my situation is though, can't you? It's like a musician being driven to cut off both his hands for whatever reason meaning he can never play with his bandmates again (hopefully I don't have quite an extreme effect on people), you have to feel for him at least a little bit, no? By pure coincidence (at least I hope it is), after writing that comment, I visited the much loved Youtube site and saw a video featuring someone with no hands! He said that despite his disability, he is still happy. Of course I'm happy for him, but at the same time it was just ever so slightly annoying as my point was having no hands would suck. Oh great, I want to destroy Youtube and now I want people with no hands to be miserable? No! Again, I AM happy for the man, really I am! I want to destroy Youtube, I hope disabled people suffer but it's nothing personal, six seveeeeen!!! The far beyond obnoxious, isn't it? That's a sentence coming from the devil. Do I have to apologise to the devil, now? (Or in other words, Lucifer?) It's just that if I do, I have to be careful not to confuse him with Steve Lukather again. It would be seriously bad if I suggested the musician said some of the stuff I said, just now!

I haven't said much about MTV, have I? It's not because deep down, I'd like to destroy that company as well but more secretly, 67… I've never really watched it, making it an ideal company to get rid of, but you have to think of other people, don't you? You could assume that because I've never owned a BMW or a Lexus and I most definitely won't be drinking anything from Starbucks again (because of the caffeine, not because they're shifty), you could assume I'd happily get rid of those companies too, but that's a very cynical thing to say. Having said that, if Starbucks did go bankrupt, I would feel relief. What if someone throws a coffee on me and it goes up my nose? What if someone hands me the drink after claiming it was merely piping hot water? It would be nice if I didn't have those worries, anymore. I'll tell you a reason to be grateful, though: I'm single-handedly putting people young people off saying 67 all the time! I'm sure that will be a relief to many. I mean… what does it mean??? Young people are clever though, if I did suddenly make 67 uncool, they could just say 68 instead. Hopefully they won't though, because the next time I make a serious apology, I could ruin that one too, by shouting ‘six eeeeight!’ all the time. It’s something no one wants to hear. Yes, I think I’ve explained myself enough now, so bye!