

Wouldn't the world be a nicer place if people said 'lol' more? As in 'Warning, do NOT touch the electric fence... lol', or 'No trespassing, lol' You could argue people wouldn't take the warnings seriously with such language, but for people like me who have no need to touch electric fences or trespass, I think it takes some of the stress of life away. Ok, ok, maybe I want to trespass a little bit, but only out of curiosity. For example a while ago now, I simply wondered what it would be like to ramble in a countryside area I considered comparable to a 'secret area' in video games. That's all. I'm just saying, there are theories that games can encourage negative behaviour and I fully agree. Is that insight of blame shifting? Judging by past experiences and Youtube videos about other people apparently like me... it's the latter. What I DIDN'T want to do was steal the equipment and that's what the rural sign was really warning about. If it said 'don't steal our stuff, hahahahaha' not only would I obey the order, it would stick in my mind as well. I'd actually have the need to tell other people about the warning only making it more effective.

If a judge released a murderer and said to him 'now don't kill again, lol!' that would upset a lot of people, fine I get that. Also, I'd imagine a convict would react so badly if a judge said to him 'you're getting 30 years in jail, lmao'. I'm just saying in many cases 'lol' can make things better, not ALL the time. It's like with people saying 'literally' all the time. Yes the word has it's place but if someone says something like 'I literally had the worst day ever' you'd feel absolutely terrible for the person, as there has surely been someone living in poverty with both plague and pneumonia simultaneously. THAT'S misuse of 'literally'. Either that or the guy is absolutely screwed. Would the rarity of the event make him feel special and cheer him up? Probably not, but if in a one in a billion event he recovered and then found a job, he could most certainly look back on his past with pride. I'm just saying that as that's similar to what I do. I blog about it, feature it in interviews where only I star, you name it. It sounds like narcissism, actually it's just nostalgia. Nostalgia where I'm the king of everyone.

Has a psychiatrist ever said I'm the king of everyone after diagnosing me with hardcore super schizophrenia? Well no, but... oh no. I'm talking about mental health again. Super sorry about that, I'll move on ASAP. Right! In university, a friend whose first language wasn't English asked me to help him write a letter to the lecturer. Bad idea, I tried to get him to say 'lol' at the end of every sentence. He didn't do it, but I don't think he trusted me as much, afterwards. But come on, imagine something like this: 'Dear Sir, lol. As English isn't my first language, I was wondering if I could ask for more time with my coursework, lol. I have asked for help from someone else on the course, but he's weirding me out a bit and I don't trust him, lol. Best wishes, Pierre. Lol.' That's what I wanted to happen. He may have come across as silly, but you can't fail a person for saying 'lol' too much can you? You can give him a bad reference to employers and say he's a bit of an idiot, but come on he was studying music, not something serious like law. That of course being the only profession I can think of where saying 'lol' would be truly bad. Maybe it would be inappropriate for doctors, too.

You'd think someone wouldn't want 'lol' to be written on their gravestone, but say you died in the year 2112... It's a palindrome isn't it? What are the chances? People laugh when they see/hear something they don't expect (unless they get diagnosed with what was thought to be an extinct disease, then you'd be quiet but feel special at the same time) and how crazy would it be if I died, then? I'd be 124! Well either that or 123 which of course is a nicer number. Now I'll apologise for talking about numbers and of course, sorry to poor Pierre who is sadly based on a real person. In fact he IS a real person, his name has just been changed. lol. Not sure what to talk about, now. Ah yes, I wrote that I was going to the gym on Friday. No, it closed early so I couldn't go! Really, I should have got an email about that, but maybe I could have done with a four day rest. Either that, or the break will make me feel lazier. Remember when I said I grew a centimetre? Google says that's extremely unlikely and that I may have just improved my posture. That's not funny. Is the internet SURE? Oh never mind, byeeeee.