

Hello, this time I would like to say sorry for saying nurses try to terrify you into getting high blood pressure, so you get told you need therapy and so that they get paid. It's a particularly damaging thing for me to say, as high blood pressure could point to panic attacks. We're not just talking about feeling sad here, we're talking about life changing conditions! To put that in perspective I felt sad when my pet fish died which was bad enough (sadly I don't think my feelings were reciprocated, though). Panic on the other hand? That's what I'd feel if my computer wouldn't update properly which is a whole new level. Therapy all so nurses aren't out of work? It's not so different to a surgeon attacking a patient with a hammer for similar reasons. As in 'NOW you need treatment.' It's bad enough in England, but it would be a very serious scandal in America as they don't have free healthcare! I'd imagine you'd get high blood pressure after such an attack as well, making it a double whammy. It would actually probably be the worst day of my life but of course I couldn't say that as I'd need more therapy. That's evil, isn't it? And to think, the worse rating you can give such a service is a frowning face, in my experience anyway. SURELY the so called surgeon would get a much more severe reaction in court, though? The judge would be like 'You're the most dangerous surgeon I have ever come across. Your punishment...?' and the judge simply looks sad, pauses and says 'Now get out of my sight.' It's not enough.

To be fair though, along with the face you can write a comment as well. As in 'the surgeon tried to kill me. Sad face.' Sounds kinda silly, but I'm sure there would be an investigation. On a lighter note, remember how I talked about some of the CD spines in my collection having sun damage? All I have to do is turn the CDs around and it looks like they have brand new spines! They're technically not spines, they're the reverse of spines but crucially they look exactly the same! I was considering re-buying them at some point, not now! Stoked! When I eventually move out of my house, I'm displaying what look like new spines proudly in my music collection, and that time they will be out of the sun! Super excited about that, too. I'm sorry if you felt bad for me when I previously complained about the damage, you didn't deserve it. I'm not saying sorry to nurses though, they probably want me to be upset. Hell, they'd probably break into my house and commit multiple acts of vandalism. 'I know, let's sun damage BOTH sides of his CD cases, see how he deals with that.' Oh no! I've done it again! I can say with 100% certainty, the odds of that happening are EXTREMELY low. In fact, I don't think that's even happened before. Even if hardened criminals did that, I'd still be confused. No... It couldn't happen... Right? Maybe...

In a way I feel like I should apologise to hardened criminals as well, basically I'm calling the stupid and odd. Sorry. I'm just saying that as there are better people to make enemies with. You know what? I think I should say sorry to nurses again. They don't ask a penny from me and that's how I treat them? I've called them stupid, odd AND cunning, how can you be stupid and cunning?? The irony is that use of language probably would justify me getting therapy. To wrap things up, I guess I should apologise for saying the Van Halen 3 album wasn't very good to a guitar teacher when I was 13 years old. I'm giving it another listen after a VERY long time ignoring it, and it's actually pretty decent! It's not one of their best albums but it completely powns most hard rock albums, that's for sure. Sorry, Paul the guitar teacher. You know what's really cool? I actually got the idea of reversing my CD spines after finding out the VH3 album's spine was reversed already in my collection for whatever reason. Sounds like an everyday mistake that wouldn't matter very much at all, no, no, no... So thank you Van Halen for giving us some of the best music of all time and thanks again for making my collection look more pretty. It's very sad the band don't really get credit for that, as it's actually saved me a fair amount of money, as explained. May you rock on forever in the minds of everyone! And on that clear-aired note... bye!