

Simon: Hello! You've been going to the gym for a long time now. Are you getting faster on the running machine?

Simon: Would you be impressed if I said that apparently I can run impossibly fast?

Simon: Yes...

Simon: Well, it may not seem much when I increase the speed on the machine's display from say 10 kmh to 10.1 kmh, BUT accelerating that much instantly? Technically that should be impossible and cause an infinite, lethal amount of G force.

Simon: You've defied physics?

Simon: Damn right I have. In fact I do so on an almost daily basis.

Simon: Do you have any broken bones?

Simon: No injuries whatsoever.

Simon: Are you the only person with such a skill?

Simon: You know what? I've never checked. I mean I've never seen a gym user exploding or whatever happens to those who accelerate way too fast. Maybe praying protects you, I have no idea.

Simon: Don't you think you should warn the personal trainers about the dangers?

Simon: As I've never seen any fatalities, I'm assuming all gym members know of the risks of immediate accelerations. A little surprising maybe and surely an accident waiting to happen but yeah, if there have been no complaints, why bother?

Simon: You'd have thought the people making the machines would have been more careful...

Simon: Either very stupid or sick in the head.

Simon: Any thoughts on fishing?

Simon: I keep seeing people going fishing wearing camouflage. Yes it does blend into the environment, but why is that important? What do these people have in mind?

Simon: Maybe they're hiding from fish??

Simon: That would make sense if fish live in bushes and trees...

Simon: Maybe they're hiding from other fisherman. So that...

Simon: Yes?

Simon: Well fishing is boring isn't it? Maybe they hide from other fishermen to up the excitement. It's like fishing and playing hide and seek at the same time. Much more fun.

Simon: Grown men playing hide and seek?

Simon: It's a fun game, filled with adventure.

Simon: I guess wearing camouflage does make hide and seek harder and I guess more fun.

Simon: Told you. It's often better when you do two things at the same time. Like eating crisps and watching Youtube videos.

Simon: Yes, I did that just a few minutes ago.

Simon: Me too. On second thoughts, maybe the people going fishing are expecting some kind of battle to break out...

Simon: If that's true, why don't they carry guns?

Simon: They're illegal.

Simon: If I thought a battle would happen and I was unarmed, I'd prefer to avoid the situation...

Simon: Hm. Any thoughts on death row last meals?

Simon: I wonder if a fancy last meal has ever been an incentive to kill someone. Someone very desperate obviously, but say if someone has never had a really nice curry... I'm just saying some people say food to die for, and some people are very gullible...

Simon: Imagine the frustration when you kill someone, spend years on death row then find last meals have been cancelled because another prisoner ordered a massive meal then said he didn't want it...

Simon: Personally I find it annoying when I misplace my keys. If you were really clever and were an expert in the legal system, you could plan to do your crime on the just the right day and end up getting your last meal on your birthday. You hear the word 'foodie' a lot these days, but that would be the ultimate foodie.

Simon: Speaking of crimes, what do you think of OJ Simpson stealing a load of stuff?

Simon: Of course I'm not condoning any kind of crime, but with a name like Orange Juice what chance did he have in life?

Simon: What do you think is a more respectable name?

Simon: I guess Bart or Homer would be bad, Lisa or Maggie would be awful, how about Steve?

Simon: And just like that, a more law abiding person. Ever wrongly taken offence at something?

Simon: I used to think 'lefties' was a hate term aimed at left handed people, rather than being a word about people with left-wing views. How can people holding scissors differently, etc. upset you so much?

Simon: Maybe right handed people blame left handed people for the UK driving on the 'wrong' side of the road. Driving like that every day of your life? That's annoying.

Simon: Yeah, well how do I feel being forced to play a right handed guitar? Ok fair enough, my left hand by far does the most of the work, but you know what I mean.

Simon: Apparently left handed people are more prone to mental illnesses. Is that true for you?

Simon: Oh no no no no no no no no no.

Simon: Ok I believe you. Speaking of your mental illness have you ever forgotten to take your meds?

Simon: Only rarely, it's not something you really want to do. To say you'll get wacky dreams is a bit of an understatement. They're not necessarily threatening, but they will make you question your sanity, and rightly so, because you will go mad. Makes sense.

Simon: And seen any mad adverts?

Simon: I saw an advert about the new Hyundai pronunciation. It used to be Hi-yundai, now it's Hyun-dai. What's it matter? How would people react if I made an advert telling people it's not Simon Wiedemann anymore, it's now Simmon Whyeederman?

Simon: They'd think you're the biggest, most attention-seeking narcissist ever.

Simon: Ex-actly. Even telling people that fact is a bit odd, but spending millions of millions of pounds telling the whole country? Were you ignored as a child? Is that what it is? I'm just saying such behaviour is extreme.

Simon: And any anecdotes about the royal family?

Simon: I've only just found out the monarch's surnames. I thought I knew! I thought deep down in my subconscious, it should be obvious what the king's and queen's last names are/were. Surely everyone knows. Then I was thinking to myself 'actually I don't know their surnames'. I had to Google them.

Simon: What are they?

Simon: Queen Elizabeth II's surname was Mary, and King Charles's surname is George!

Simon: I had no idea...

Simon: Right! Think of one person in the world who is that famous and yet you don't know their full name. You want to know the only example I could come up with?

Simon: Go on...

Simon: The musician Prince.

Simon: A royal name?

Simon: Yes, that can't be a coincidence.

Simon: What do you think is going on?

Simon: I don't know!

Simon: I'll Google it now. Ok, his surname was Nelson.

Simon: He has a surname then?

Simon: Yep, very ordinary, just like the royalty. Do you have any examples of crazy random happenstances?

Simon: Would you believe to save a file, I randomly typed 'hui7bjk' and on a later date I created another file called 'hui7bjp'? What are the odds?

Simon: A one letter difference?

Simon: Yep, I thought I was button mashing randomly. Not so, something in my subconscious seems to think the two examples have at least some meaning. Maybe my subconscious is a rambling drunk?

Simon: It could explain why you keep getting lost and misspelling your name.

Simon: Huh.

Simon: And any positive stories to end this interview?

Simon: Yes! After so many years I finally have proof! I thought I'd been turning my alarm off in a sleepy stupor on rare occasions, actually I recently witnessed my alarm clock not going off at the time it should have sounded! Woo!

Simon: And an interesting thought to end this interview?

Simon: Wouldn't it be funny if you couldn't vote for the Eurovision song contest if you're mentally ill?

Simon: Why would that be funny?

Simon: I don't know.

Simon: And an interesting observation to end this interview?

Simon: Elon Musk tweeted 'Trust no one'. It's not quite as bad as a Prime Minister saying that, but still it's made me nervous.

Simon: What would you rather he said?

Simon: Everything's ok.

Simon: Yep fair enough.

Simon: Now bye?

Simon: Byeeee.