

Sorry to now ex-Indian restaurant Ivory Tusk for implying they were ivory dealers. I should note they didn't close because of me, but if I did complain to the police when the foodery was still operating I would have a very strong case. 'Come to Ivory Tusk, both for the food and the lucrative illegal trade'. I'd imagine their menu would be very strange. Something like 'Starters, Main Courses, Desserts, Priceless elephant tusks (not for eating but for decoration or quack medicine, for example).' Pretty unbelievable, it's much more unbelievable when you take into consideration the fact the place was running for many, many years. I mean what message is that giving to criminals? People could very easily get the impression drug dealers could drive around in special vans saying 'drugs' on them, much like ice cream vans say 'ice cream'. What are the police going to do? Probably nothing. That's interesting as I saw a mini documentary on Youtube about a clearly very rich person wearing jewellery in a very deprived area, and when the interviewer asked if he was a drug dealer, the apparent felon said something like 'oh no, no, no...' very unconvincingly. What did the police do? Not a lot, but to be fair I did read he got sent to jail in the end.

People can quite legally carry guns in America, I'm starting to think that would be ok in England, too. Technically speaking I mean. We're basically living in Grand Theft Auto. A fun game, I love how you have the freedom to do whatever you want. What's not so fun is people having the freedom to attack or rob YOU. The only games I can think of right now that I want to really happen are games like Mario Kart. But would I really want to meet Super Mario? As the saying goes, never meet your heroes. He could be a right asshole, don't let his innocent voice saying 'yahoooo!' fool you. Adding a few years to my mental age, I suppose Gran Turismo would be good in real life, too. I like Armored Core as well, in particular I liked designing my own mechs, but mech fighting is an extremely dangerous profession, and for that reason it's not for me. I would like to be a general in the Command and Conquer games, but what if you lose a match? The enemy are coming for you. Unless maybe you're really bad at the game, then the other side would just be like 'let him go back to his life, it doesn't really matter.' That's not so bad, but what a reputation you'd get. A humiliating situation for any general. Lastly, Sonic the Hedgehog seems like a cool dude, but the constant speed? A severe accident waiting to happen. If I could meet him? I'd just tell him Gerald Robotnik is the least of his worries, he will get a concussion sooner or later. Then try and spin round very fast. Everything might be spinning around for the hedgehog though, just not in reality.

Maybe I should say sorry to the police for saying I'd have a case against Ivory Tusk earlier on. On second thoughts, I almost certainly wouldn't. I'd be like 'There's a restaurant that has been illegally dealing ivory for many years, now! It's called 'Ivory Tusk', you HAVE to do something!' Would the police respond by stupidly saying 'This is BIG news!'? Surely not. It's actually quite likely the law have eaten there. If I did have a case, they'd be super foolish if they just ignored the ivory on the menu. Unless of course the police are shady too and wanted some ivory for themselves, but that's even MORE offensive. So here's another apology: Sorry to the police for saying you don't care about the illegal ivory trade. Also, they wouldn't put up with drug dealers driving around in vans saying 'drug dealer' on them. If they did, it makes you wonder what ISN'T ok. Someone would call them up saying 'I've just seen someone deal drugs and ivory, please hurry!' Then the cops would sigh and say 'Look, we're busy dealing with REAL crime. Please stop bothering us.' A society falling apart. I would also like to apologise for me complaining that the computer update I recently had has resulted in me needing a mobile phone to log into my email accounts. Some of the confirmation codes I've been sent to my mobile aren't bad! I'm waiting to see a palindrome and I'm sure I will sometime in the near future! And on that happy note... bye!
