

Have you ever heard microtonal music? That is music that doesn't stick to twelve semitones in an octave but uses even more notes? Wow, that sounds like a good idea, that must revolutionise music, surely! Angine de Poitrine is an instrumental act that uses the extra notes, and what do I have to say about the so called 'rock duo'? Well... if I saw people dressed like them, with the creepy black and white dots all over them, the huge flapping nose, and playing music the way they do in the street, I'd probably attack them. My gut reaction would be 'something is seriously wrong here Simon, and you may be in danger', it would be a knee jerk reaction, I'm sorry. It's like seeing a venomous spider coming out of nowhere, I'd just be like 'what the (expletive) is that?!' And I don't think I'm alone with those thoughts either, their music is truly horrible as is their dress sense, it wouldn't even be my own fault. Not exactly THEIR'S but not mine. I'm sure the duo are nice people deep down but I can't deal with that kind of stuff. I can understand why the two musicians prefer to be anonymous, if not people would follow them around constantly with bug spray and something hard like a book to hit them with. Again, I know that's not what they want to hear, but I didn't want to hear I had knee pain that may take a while to get better a few years ago, now. What I didn't do was continue running, get what I'm saying?

Having said that, I have heard microtonal music that is pretty good! It was basically chill ambient music that sounded ever so slightly weird and off, but in a good way. It basically just sounded like the synths were out of tune a tad, but apparently not! Not exactly revolutionary, but a nice try. Annoyingly I can't remember what the ambient act was called, yet ADP appears in my Youtube recommended videos frequently. I guess the problem is that I do actually watch ADP videos a fair amount, but only really because they're so weird, it's morbid curiosity. In comparison do I really want to watch videos about how cancer kills you? Not deep down, but I do anyway. Now I know no musician wants to be called a cancer (apart from the Cancer Bats), but ADP's stuff does at least SOUND worse than cancer, which I believe is a silent disease. Having a small lump on your skin also looks better than having a massive, long nose with black and white spots on it that bounces up and down. You'd probably look better than the musicians if you had plague. I'm not saying I'd rather have plague than have these people's dress sense though, which is at least something positive. I'm assuming the black death didn't have a sound either, other than those afflicted saying stuff like 'fml' of course.

Even the act's massive hats look disturbing, you could easily fit a trapezium-shaped bomb in one hat and a phallus shaped bomb in the other one. The thing is, even if the members of the public did think there was something dangerous hidden inside the hats, don't expect brave members of society trying to stop the two, rather expect everyone nearby to shiftily cross the road. As in 'what in God's name are those hats supposed to represent? Whatever the case, I want no part of it!' I mean tackling someone carrying a bomb is a heroic story anyone should be very proud to tell, but tackling someone with a bomb shaped like THAT? It would probably result in feelings of shame. You can try making light of the situation but people may laugh at you. Now I know that's a very pessimistic thing to say, but what can I say? It's a funny shape. I really should point out that no one on EARTH should presume ADP are a terrorist group and that they should tackle them to the ground whilst throwing their hats away as far as they possibly can... I mean... Oh no... what have I just said?? Again, it's possible someone might act that was as a gut reaction, but the act doesn't deserve it, that's what I'm trying to say. Their instruments might deserve it though. Smash them or at least space the frets out normally... Ok, I think that's everything cleared up! Still not great news for the band, but you can't like everything! Bye!