

It's coming up to the end of the month, and that means I'm getting fairly tired of my site. So what should I do? Oh screw it, I'll just rank random words from worst to best again. It would have been REALLY random if I put random words in a random order, but if I did that I think it would be too far. In comparison, if someone you hadn't met in a while phoned you up to tell you he had ran out of beans, you may think 'Huh. Random'. However, if a garden designer from Japan told you he wanted to meet with you to talk to you about his favourite shoe brand and that he likes to put cheese in his shoes, that would be troubling. Now let's go!

Unlawful

I don't like unlawful things, what are you insinuating? Unlike James, I have never had a mental breakdown and felt the need to impersonate a teacher (at the same time), but if I had a nervous breakdown and was in a school at just the wrong moment? Chances are, I would in fact be impersonating a teacher. That's the thing with schizophrenia - you don't think clearly. No shame in it, we all make mistakes.

Capture

Again, I don't like capturing things. Unlike the prior word, you can capture things legally, but still, if I was forced to take a fifty fifty chance where I could either capture say a pest spider or a massive endangered elephant that can act aggressively, I would find the situation extremely stressful to say the least. In fact, I'd probably cry. Again, at least there is a good chance I would be doing something acceptable, but if things go wrong, I mean... #sniffles.

Sweat

People who like sweat are surely weirdos. Having said that, at the gym I have noticed that if some of (my) sweat drops on to my tongue (the sweat of other people I don't like, if someone deliberately got sweat on me, I'd film them then complain) you do get I guess a fairly satisfying salty flavour, much like ready salted crisps! I never lick myself, but if I was forced to by a freak? Fine. But when his back was turned? I'd punch him in the back of the head.

Hot

I don't like sweat so it's no surprise I don't like heat too much either. As you know, hot weather is linked to crime, the evidence is there. Spicy food I do like, though. It's like with sweat - pros and cons, but this time there are more pros. Yes, spicy food can make you sweat, but if you do eat such foods it won't make other people sweat (unless it's really spicy maybe) so it doesn't matter too much.

Release

To be as clear as I possibly can, I'd rather release something than capture it. But still, release something that's mine? Well, it's mine, isn't it. Don't want to. Is 'release your CDs' a phrase meaning 'give them away'? I've heard people donating albums, but not in the language I've just used. Actually no, of course 'release your CDs' is a phrase. I've heard it countless times. Ok, I've just typed it twice. Still though.

Necklace

Can't say I like wearing necklaces, tbh. Wearing a necklace is MILES better than kidnapping someone though. And someone else wearing a necklace? Lightyears ahead. I don't think I'd ever wear one of those necklaces that has a huge clock on it even if I was the only person with a clock in the world. How the trend caught on in the first place is anyone's guess. And why do only rappers wear them? They can find a million ways to rap about all sorts of crazy things, yet they're never sure of the time? And even if they are unsure of the time... I mean, wristwatches...

Particular

I can think of few words I'm more indifferent to than particular. Google says the word is 'used to single out an individual member of a specified group or class'. Can't say that ever happens to me, so of course I find commenting on the word emotionally upsetting, I mean difficult.

Station

Stations are useful I guess, but do I like them? I certainly don't love them anyway. I guess I like them more than being singled out, that's rarely good. (Although I was recently singled out in a postcode lottery and got £25!!) You know what? On second thoughts, without stations I'd be pretty stuck when in London. Good stuff. But not awe inspiring, apart from London Waterloo which is massive. Something like 25 trains!

Science

Yes, I owe a lot to science with my brain medicine, but at the same time, if there wasn't science in the first place (for example the internet and constant spam emails saying you have a virus and someone has stolen all of your money) I would be a lot more healthy, I think.

Tank

I hate to sound aggressive, but I just like tanks more than science. I can't work out why tanks look so good. They look really bulky, but at the same time, I mean... woo. I suppose I don't like tanks more than my medication, I'm actually genuinely fond of it, but if I was in a situation without meds, I could sell the tank for meds money. With the change I could then buy a jeep with a machine gun mounted on the back. A downgrade, but they're cool too.

Effective

Who doesn't like it when things are effective? Call it the German inside of me, but when I do something that's effective, I do get at least a small boost. Ok I tell a lie, I get a massive boost, because it doesn't always happen.

Maximum

Ooh, the maximum. We've come along way from kidnapping elephants, can you imagine having maximum strength/speed/skill? It would be awesome. Maximum plague would be bad, but plague is rare. So you can take your chances.

Ok! I promise to be more innovative with my writing next month, or at least at the start of next month, but right now I'm knackered. I have to be honest, whilst I almost always say I never skip words my online generator comes up with, I did skip the word 'instinct' because I've done that word before and I didn't really know what to say about it the first time round. We all have instincts, right? Better than stations. Bye!