

Did you know that in the Warhammer universe, all that matters is war? Most civilisations spend about 2% of their money on their military, imagine the paranoia if England suddenly spent ALL their money on it. It wouldn't just be scary for other countries, but England too. I mean... what's going on??? Why has the country been renamed 'England 40k' like in the game? Why can't I buy groceries anymore? Why can't I surf the internet or have any running water? Why have guns been renamed as 'bolt throwers' and 'meltaguns', become legalised and posted to people? Something big must be happening and it doesn't sound good at all. Say England suddenly had a military that was 50 times bigger than any other country, that wouldn't go unnoticed, would it? It wouldn't simply be a case of other countries going 'well, that's very extreme...' and leaving it at that, they too would prepare for war and all of a sudden the whole world goes to hell.

It wouldn't just be scary, it would be boring too. Say if you meet someone for the first time, what would you say? 'How are you, what do you do?' You know the answer, he would say 'I'm a soldier.' The only variety you would get if the soldier explained what TYPE of soldier he was, for example a space marine. You could ask him what it's like going to space, which does sound fascinating, but all he'd talk about is shooting people, there. Sure most people haven't shot someone so that hopefully would be a very unusual story for you, but if you're made to shoot people and you don't like it very much at all, would you like to hear more stories of shootings, or would you rather find a quiet place to cry?

England 40k could explain to other countries that it's not looking to start a new world war, instead it wants to prepare for an alien threat, similar to that in Warhammer 40k. But why does England have to mimic Warhammer so exactly? What's the point? Say if machines started to try and take over the world, like in the Terminator films. Would the leader of the non-fictional human resistance keep his name or would he change it to John Conner? If he did change his name to that, wouldn't you think he was joking around and not taking the situation as seriously as you would like? It's also like Kier Starmer hearing of an alien threat and changing his name to Obi-Wan Kenobi.

If 100% of a country's money was spent on war, that would mean there would be no health service. Imagine going into war and having it explained to you that you won't get treatment if you get shot. There's being disillusioned after many years of fighting, and then there's immediate disillusionment. That would be made twice as bad coming from a leader calling himself 'Luke Skywalker.' If there was a threat of alien invasion, I'd hope the threat was coming from beings that could be reasoned with. I'd just be like 'Can't you see what you're doing?? Our leader has changed his name to one that's really goofy, probably out of desperation! Either that, or he's finally shown his true colours and has turned out to be a bit of an idiot. Look, let's just talk.' You have to try SOMETHING.

You wouldn't want a country to spend 100% of its money on the NHS, either. I may be on brain medication and I would be grateful if everyone in society spent all their time on me and others like me, but come on, it's not THAT bad. I take the meds and move on. :) Spending 100% on the video games industry just sounds silly, especially as I don't really play any games. Boy would I feel left out and I'd have no meds as well! It wouldn't just be bad for me though, as no one would have any food, which is why the scenario must never happen. Talk about advanced graphics, though. To conclude, people may complain that they don't like England very much, but actually it could be run a lot worse, as has been proved. And on that happy and inspiring note... bye!