

Simon: Hello! Any thoughts on this Tuesday?

Simon: I do!

Simon: Wow. And they said it couldn't be done...

Simon: I know, right? Tuesday thoughts? That's not catchy...

Simon: Not like Thursday or Friday thoughts.

Simon: Is Tuesday thoughts alliteration, technically speaking?

Simon: Google?

Simon: Ok, I've just searched for 'is Tuesday thoughts alliteration?' and to my surprise whilst I didn't get an exact answer, I DID get lots of examples of Tuesday themed alliterations.

Simon: And they are?

Simon: Toasty Tuesday...

Simon: That sounds like fun...

Simon: Mm, yum yum. Then there's Twittering Tuesday which I don't like so much...

Simon: Because you've fallen out with the local birds?

Simon: Yes, they keep signing tunes to annoy me and it's clearly on purpose. Anyway, there's also Toady Tuesday, Technochrome Tuesday and Twisting Tuesday.

Simon: What's technochrome mean?

Simon: Sounds like a combination of techno music and heavy metal...

Simon: Industrial metal, you mean?

Simon: Yes, like Rammstein!

Simon: A fun Tuesday! Very heavy and catchy.

Simon: Yes, and as the band's lyrics are deep it would be thoughtful, too.

Simon: Sadly however, fun Tuesday is definitely not alliteration.

Simon: Would it be alliteration if fun was spelt 'thun'?

Simon: Again, I have no idea.

Simon: I've done a more sensible Google search and 'th' sounds followed by 't' sounds aren't alliteration because they don't sound the same. There you go.

Simon: Oh. Thank you. Would you like to speculate what a Twisting Tuesday would be?

Simon: Well, I twist open my vitamin D tablets on a Tuesday.

Simon: Just on a Tuesday?

Simon: Nope, but it doesn't matter, does it?

Simon: Fair point. What's on your mind, now?

Simon: There was a guy on the internet who clearly meant to say Metallica has sold over 125 million albums, but he said 125 instead. The way he sounded so excited about that fact got me the most.

Simon: The biggest metal band on the planet released 125 albums and that's amazing?

Simon: Apparently.

Simon: Maybe the guy was thinking Metallica lost out on lots of album sales because of Napster?

Simon: 124,999,875 album sales?

Simon: Yes, you can see why the band were so angry at the company.

Simon: I'd really hate someone if they stole around 125 million pounds from me. Or about £125 less than that.

Simon: Metallica have done very well not making an angry song about the company. A rapper would write a diss track.

Simon: Oh definitely, rappers are very easy to annoy. I can't even begin to imagine how hateful a song would be towards someone who stole that much from them.

Simon: Was their album 'St. Anger' released after all the Napster business? If so, maybe that's where they got their album name from? And of course their lyric 'I'm madly in anger with you!'

Simon: I don't know, maybe. I'm madly in anger with you Napster, you bunch of bellends.

Simon: Hang on...

Simon: What?

Simon: You said the person said the band sold 125 albums. Maybe he meant that literally, as in the band worked in a music shop selling CDs...

Simon: The band hasn't earned enough money from all their music, so they work in a shop in their spare time?

Simon: Yep.

Simon: No, that's suggesting the band are absolutely OBSESSED with money...

Simon: You never know. Say they're travelling on the train and have nothing to do. They could earn some extra cash by working as ticket inspectors.

Simon: No, that's offensive. I actually think you should do another apology.

Simon: Oh God, not another one.

Simon: It's for the best.

Simon: No, there's more. Say they're walking home and they notice how much litter there is. They could take out a plastic bag from their pockets (which they have with them at all times just in case), they could put the litter in the bags and film themselves. Again, to get some extra cash.

Simon: Wow, is there anything else they could do?

Simon: When they get their hair cut, they could collect their hair and sell it to make wigs.

Simon: Well... they clearly have an addiction to making money...

Simon: Oh I know. In a way I admire them for it, but it is greedy. I think it's best to move on and change the subject. Even with the apology I'm feeling kinda uncomfortable.

Simon: Agreed.

Simon: So, what's on your mind now?

Simon: Have you seen that WW2 based TV show 'SAS Rogue Heroes'?

Simon: I have indeed.

Simon: What's with the contemporary rock music soundtrack? Some of the songs were released over 40 years after the war ended...

Simon: You could take the idea further, and the soldiers could relax after battles by playing on the Playstation.

Simon: Oh there's definitely an idea for a sketch, there. Is that new, though? It sounds too good to be true.

Simon: Not just an idea for a sketch, but a whole film!

Simon: Yes, and after the Playstation they could hone their fighting skills by going to the nearby Laser Quest. And then they could party to Metallica music.

Simon: So you don't use all your sketch ideas here, would you like to change the subject?

Simon: Yes, the Youtube subtitles should have said 'on the cheap' but said 'on the chief'. As in 'Why did you buy that game?' 'It was on the chief!'

Simon: Well, chiefs are high ranking people. I can see the attraction of buying games from chiefs...

Simon: No, ON chiefs.

Simon: Ok. What on top of their heads?

Simon: Could do, could do. Or if they wanted to carry more games, they could lie down and stack them on their backs. I reckon if they kept completely still the chiefs could stack at least 50 games.

Simon: Quite the sight...

Simon: And when the customers ask why the games are being sold at their normal price, you could say 'I said they're sold on the CHIEF! Not on the cheap!'

Simon: You have to wonder what the chief is getting out of the situation, though...

Simon: He's part of a pun!

Simon: To me that makes things worse...

Simon: Oh not at all. The pun could be taken even further.

Simon: Oh God.

Simon: If the chief lied down in just the right position, with the side of his face on the ground, you could stack things on his cheek!

Simon: On the chief's cheek?

Simon: Yes! And you know what?

Simon: What?

Simon: Actually, I say lower the cost of the products as well. Then you get 'On the chief's cheek, cheap.'

Simon: I see.

Simon: And what do costumers say after buying the items?

Simon: What?

Simon: They say 'cheers!'

Simon: And as they leave, they say 'cheerio!'?

Simon: Yes! THAT'S proper use of alliteration!

Simon: It puts Tuesday Thoughts to shame.

Simon: No, that's not even alliteration...

Simon: Ok.

Simon: How about this for an idea: You could sell things on the cheep!

Simon: You sell things on the noises birds make?

Simon: Yes, if you could just work out how to do that, you can sell things at their normal price whilst simultaneously making it sound like you're offering a huge bargain.

Simon: Dammit, you're right.

Simon: Hmmm, how though? This is a tough one. I know!

Simon: Yes?

Simon: You could wait for a bird to cheep, then you drop an item on the wind coming from the bird's mouth and then you sell the item 'on the cheep' whilst selling it at the usual price.

Simon: You really are shady, aren't you?

Simon: If people think I'm lowering the price of products after I drop them on the wind coming out of bird's mouths, it's not my problem. Why anyone would assume that, I have no idea.

Simon: Because it's on the cheep!

Simon: Don't shout at me.

Simon: You know what? Leave the on the cheep idea, it would never work. People aren't that dumb.

Simon: Ok. Moving on, I heard 'flowers, candles and balloons had been left out' as 'flowers, cannibals and balloons'...

Simon: Cannibals are left out to what, honour the dead?

Simon: Yes, that's what I thought.

Simon: And how do cannibals honour the dead?

Simon: Who likes dead people more than cannibals? They can't get enough of them!

Simon: Yes, but do they HONOUR the dead?

Simon: Not in the traditional sense, but many people would run from a dead body, how's that honouring it?

Simon: You're partially right, neither honour the dead. You know how you should really treat a dead person?

Simon: How?

Simon: Dress him in a nice suit.

Simon: Lol!

Simon: No, I was being serious.

Simon: Really?

Simon: Yes, that's what happens.

Simon: Well, that sounds like a prank to me. Anyway, at very least, flowers and balloons had been left out, not cannibals. That's nice for the dead.

Simon: Yes, the cannibal idea was a huge misunderstanding.

Simon: Oh.

Simon: Is that all from you? Or do you have any more nonsense?

Simon: No that's it!

Simon: Ok, then byeeeeeee!