

Here's a puzzling quote: 'He has a kind nature that I find refreshing'. How does this person drink? He drinks kindness? Keep him away from a prison or a war zone I guess, otherwise he'd be severely dehydrated. People say people from London are rude, so that's a cause for concern as well. He'd be a bit thirsty. Going in the opposite direction, it is more than possible to be hydrated too much, so don't visit too many empathetic nuns in one go, otherwise your brain will start to swell. I bet that's not something you've heard before, it's important though, too many nuns cause cerebral edema, just like water. I said the medical name of the condition to make it sound as serious as possible, because it is serious. It's like someone saying 'remember that guy in school? He went mental.' A normal reaction to that would be 'lol', but if you were to say 'remember that guy? He has schizophrenia, now', it sounds a lot more grave. Let's ask A.I. if it knows anything about the horrifying condition. So, do nuns cause cerebral edema? 'Based on the provided search results, there is no evidence that nuns cause cerebral edema.' Ah, based on the provided search results? Well my theory is new, isn't it? All theories are new at some point, calling an idea 'wrong' because people have only just heard about it is insanity.

I guess I should reassure people that drinking lots of water is perfectly safe. Just don't drink litres and litres in one go. There are some people who can binge drink lots of liquids as they are used to it, but the average person? Very dangerous. It's particularly alarming because someone might think drinking lots of water is a very good and easy way of making money on a platform such as Youtube, the next thing you know, their brain swells as much as when visiting lots of nuns. As I have discovered the condition, I think I have the right to name it: Nun-induced hydro cerebral edema Wiedemann syndrome. Or NIHCEWS. Interestingly an anagram of 'in chews' or eating indoors. Oh, if only it was an anagram of 'in slurps', though that would mean the condition only applies to indoor binge drinking and why would that happen? I wonder what the condition would be called if the acronym was INCHEWS... Induced nun cerebral hydro edema Wiedemann syndrome? Just as I thought, a random collection of words. That's annoying, I was hoping for a hospital drama to say it dramatically, as in 'Dammit, we've got a severe case of inchews right here! Get the specialist in here, stat!' I guess it wasn't to be. How do you treat the not quite as catchy NIHCEWS, I wonder? With salty food, maybe? As salt makes you dehydrated? Pizza is salty isn't it? As in 'Get the pepperoni pizza in here, stat!' I think that's even better.

I guess I should point out you don't really treat the condition with pizza. What an action packed day that would be. An unbearable amount of water, lots of views, lots of positive comments, lots of comments calling you stupid, a near death situation and then pizza. Oh yes, and then more comments calling you stupid. That's annoying for me as the condition and incident would be associated with me! There is actually another condition called Wiedemann syndrome so the person who discovered that would be associated with dumb over drinking as well. Good. I Googled the symptoms of Wiedemann syndrome and one of its traits is a crease in your ear. Luckily I don't have that, as it is a sign of health problems, though my ears are a bit weird. I was thinking 'Do I Simon Wiedemann, have Wiedemann syndrome?' Turns out no, but it did seem that way for a bit. At least it's not called 'Simon's syndrome'. Why would my parents notice my ears and then name me 'Simon' after the condition or indeed any disease? Having said that, I wouldn't want to be named after something too positive, either. Heaven Wiedemann? People would expect too much from me, then they get to know me and have a very warped view of the afterlife. And on that disturbing note... Bye!
