

Do Aliens Exist?

by

Simon Wiedemann

© 2019

Do aliens exist? I'm convinced they do. Why? Because of an obvious Freudian slip when some person wrote a very early dictionary. Think about the word 'Earthworm'. Why write 'Earth'? All animals come from Earth, right? The author clearly knew of worms from other planets, otherwise he would have simply written 'worm' as that was all he needed. What's truly amazing is apparently the mysterious word was first recorded in around 1400-1450 AD. (Then it was later mindlessly copied by others). How has the alien conspiracy been covered up for so long, how was it discovered and where did the beings come from?

How about this theory? Earthworms came to Earth through some kind of spaceship, (roughly) 600 million years ago. Sorry, but I can only speculate about what kind of ship, so I'll move on. As the animals had been around for so much time without being discovered as super-intelligent, (their mask of typical bug normality made others leave them alone) they got careless and started speaking in English (just for fun) in what they thought was a highly remote area, uninhabited by humans. But apparently not. The person who did hear the worms coincidentally, was you know who. The man and worms got talking, after the former threatened to step on them, and soon enough he was enlightened about all kinds of space worms in return for his silence. Did the writer keep his promise, though (or rather intend to)? It's quite possible that no one even batted an eyelid at his word with this planet's name in it, and that could explain how worms aren't regarded as somewhat magical in this day and age.

But what if there are people who sussed out the dictionary's 'mistake', and who are consequently in the know about the beings, today? And what if they are extremely careful about not sharing information about them? If they are, why? Maybe the two types of lifeforms are working together on secret projects. For example, maybe mankind can benefit from the technology that allows organisms to regrow after being cut up into two or more pieces, and maybe worms are getting the latest computer games from mankind in return. (Sound silly? Have you seen the latest Doom??) But hang on... Why is the potentially life saving, if not life-perpetuating technology being kept hidden? What if only certain groups in humankind are planned to be immortal? If so, is their goal to overthrow the rest of weaker society? That's an alarming thought, which is why you must go into your gardens right now, and get talking those slithery bugs. You must demand them to tell you their secrets, before it's too late! Go!