

Hello, this time I would like to apologise to Deftones's Chino Moreno for saying he loves filling his albums with silence whilst boastfully claiming such albums are very long. Cheeky Moreno. Not only would such an album be extremely disappointing for his fans, it wouldn't even be new as John Cage did a very similar thing! You know that modern art masterpiece that is a banana sellotaped to a wall? Judging by my prior writing complaining about Chino, you could assume HIS idea of a modern art classic would be to sellotape TWO bananas to a wall. Let it go, it's been done and no one really liked it the first time. To make things clear, yes there is some silence on the Def album I talked about, but not to deceive or annoy his fans, but so the following bonus track takes you by surprise! It will only ever take you by surprise the one time, or not at all if you notice how long your CD player says the album length is like mine does, but if you have a basic CD player and you're new to the album? Got you!

I also said his 'fraudulent' album 'Around the Fur' should have really be called '(getting) Around the Law' and then I suggested the last word of the former album was a spelling mistake. Yes, I was genuinely saying Deftones tried to release an album of silence, knew it was an illegal con, then tried to boast about that fact, but SOMEHOW someone screwed the last word of the LP up and said 'fur' instead of 'law'. I'm sorry, but I just can't see that ever happening. It's just beyond ridiculous and to be honest, I'm not sure where anyone on Earth would get such an idea! If someone said I was called Simon Wiedemann because it's short for Simon Wiedeconmann not only would I be offended, I would be frightened, too. I mean... where's the logic, there? That's what gets to me the most. If I was sitting next to someone making the claim? I could ask for an apology, but the guy would just be like 'you want an apple on me?' or something equally demented, and I'd just have to leave.

Now I'm going to say something interesting and apologise about it shortly after. Here goes: Chino said he loves singing Weezer's 'Blue Album'. One of its songs includes the lyrics 'I look just Buddy Holly'. Seeing the Def singer sing that would be very weird as he looks NOTHING like Buddy Holly. It would like me be singing 'Booooo! I look just like Judy Dench'. Yes, my eyes aren't very good, but that's what glasses are for. Even if glasses couldn't help me, deep down inside I should know for absolute certain, I couldn't POSSIBLY look like her. I don't know the name of the delusion I would be suffering from if I did believe that, but it would be a delusion. Clearly very rare making me feel the need to boast about that, I'd be straight down to the local psychiatrist. Little would I realise it's like boasting of having a rare disease like plague. How would a psychiatrist feel if I sung my song to them? It would be crossing a line, what would I be trying to say? A common thing for psych doctors to ask is 'How is your medication working for you?' Try saying 'good' after singing such a song.

Ok, now for the apology for the last paragraph: I'm sorry for implying or at least briefly thinking Chino in the worst case scenario could have it in him to impersonate an elderly female actress in the company of psychiatric doctors whilst singing. And even if he did for whatever reason, I'm sure his singing would be very good. Sure, that wouldn't really be the point, but if I was there at the time, it would be one of the best highlights of my life. Some people want simple things like handshakes from their heroes, I want something a little more intense. I'm not saying it would ever happen, that in itself would really make me need to apologise, but it DID ever happen, for the first time in my life I could look Chino in the eye and say 'I get you.' I guess now I should apologise to all the psychiatrists out there. They are actually people to be respected. Certainly not sang to whilst wearing the wig of an elderly woman. Yeah, I think that apology just then was enough, so bye!
