

Sorry for making another music artist seem satanic, this time Santana. (I called him 'Satana'). It's always the devil with me, isn't it? First there was Steve Lukather, who I called Steve Lucifer, then there was the Latin American guitarist just mentioned, and there was also a guy I didn't speak of, called Devin Townsend, who I refer to in my mind as 'Devil Townsend', even though interviews with the musician make him seem like a nice guy. (His music not so much). Who am I going to have a go at next? Maybe CC Deville? The thing is, that's not his real name so does that mean he wants to be satanic? If I called myself 'Simon SayTanne' you'd have to wonder why, right? Even if the spelling of the devil was changed by me slightly and it sounded kinda exotic. CC DeVille sounds like 'see the devil' or rather 'see see' him, i.e. see him twice. He's not as bad as CCC DeVille though he's really evil, because of course he likes to see the devil even more. There are devil worshippers, but CCC DeVille sounds obsessed with the devil which is taking things even further, it suggests the devil is on the person's mind every minute of every day. :S God knows what CCCC DeVille would be like, I guess he thinks about Satan more than possible. We're going in supernatural territories now, which is making me feel uncomfortable. Of course it is, who wants to think about someone who loves evil so much it bends space and time?? If I ever saw such a person, I'd hit him.

Of course, now I should apologise to CC DeVille. How many times did I suggest he and his imitators and therefore friends want to see Beelzebub? It was three. Three times. Wow, all in one paragraph, too. If you don't know who he is, CC is the guitarist of glam metal band Poison. Imagine a poor guy just trying to have a good time playing music, then I come along and say he likes to hang around with people who not only pride themselves on being wicked, but mess around with the rules of physics. Say the smartest person you know studied science at Harvard for 7 years or so, and told you that he's finally found a way after all this time, to love Satan so much it shouldn't even be possible according to people like Stephen Hawking and Einstein. Would you be impressed, or would you actually be physically sick? It would be the latter, wouldn't it? I should also say sorry to Devil, I mean Devin Townsend for saying interviews make him 'seem' nice. No seem about it, he IS nice, how about that. If someone spent a few hours writing about me, comparing me to God's arch nemesis and in the end said it actually seemed like I wasn't like him, it wouldn't be enough, obviously. I'd actually sue the guy. It also wouldn't be good enough if someone said it seemed like I wasn't a drug lord, bank robber or even petty thief.

Ah yes, and sorry for suggesting you either get kind and lazy police or hardworking, evil police. If that's what people believed, what would be the point of calling them, really? You might be concerned that the law would either not care about you, or plain rob you. I actually think that's worse than all the CC DeVille business. Sure he'd be very upset with my writings and his friends and family could end up avoiding him (until I apologise, of course :)), but me scaring masses of people off calling the emergency services would actually make ME the devil. So let's put things right again: If someone burgles your home, etc. never, ever, EVER assume you'll just get robbed again. It sounds weird coming from me, someone who is on medication for paranoid schizophrenia, but you have to trust others. It's a long process, you know? Recovering from the mental illness just mentioned, I mean. I certainly wouldn't have stopped thinking CC DeVille wanted to double see the devil overnight. No, at first I would have believed the guitarist wanted to see him, after month or so, the idea would sound more than probable, a month or so later it would have sounded fair enough I suppose but kind of 50/50, and now of course, after all these years, I can say he's a genuinely great guy. Even if I've never met him. And on that inspiring note... bye!