

Shaving Foam
by
Simon Wiedemann

© 2020

Is it just me, or does shaving foam simply vanish with no explanation? I mean I put it on my face, I shave and then it goes without me washing it away. I check my razor for any of the stuff, I look for it in the sink, but no, it's gone. That must mean it's passing through my skin and into my body somehow. Sound crazy? Well, the same phenomenon happens when I have a bath. I get in the thing and the water level goes down. Water is being absorbed by me, too! (Ahhh, the top of my bath has a drain-like device to stop flooding. THAT'S where the water goes. Phew!) Ok, so foam passes through my skin and water doesn't. Am I supposed to be relieved? No! God knows what's happening to me as apparently shaving foam is poisonous. But I'm feeling fine... So that must mean I'm immortal. Pretty cool, but definitely weird.

There is a black metal band out there called 'Immortal'. It makes me wonder - do they absorb shaving foam with no health effects? I've looked for a band online called 'Shaving Foam' and there isn't one, perhaps showing all members are now dead. Anyway, interestingly Immortal have a song called 'All Shall Fall'. Does THAT relate to poisonous foam? With lyrics such as 'armed in the fires of combat', perhaps not unless you're comparing combat to shaving?? That would be I guess KIND of understandable when you consider all the blood, but not really. A more important question is why the HELL aren't cosmetic companies concerned about killing the vast majority of their customers?? This is an outrage! Can you remember when Judas Priest got accused of killing their fanbase? People were horrified!

The only explanation is there is a cover up. Having asked Google 'why do shaving companies kill their customers?' I found no matching results. Pathetic. Here's a thought: Do you have to use foam? Why not use soap instead? I mean it's nice and smooth, the only difference is you actually wash the stuff away. What I can't make sense of however, is when you put 'can you use soap as shaving foam' into Google there ARE results. I guess it's a question that's less explosive, but still, I was expecting more censorship. Of course shaving foam is recommended over soap, but at least the search engine didn't say all soap users will die.

Hm. That's funny. After visiting Immortal's Wikipedia page in the hope of finding any shaving foam clues, I've found the band has some 'live members', implying others are dead. Maybe foam can't kill some of the musicians because they've already been killed. But how do you know if you're alive or no more? I mean the musicians don't LOOK deceased. They act the same as mortals and all that. Maybe I've already been killed by shaving foam. Unfortunately, my search 'how to know if you're dead' provided me with no scientific answers. If the internet doesn't know, why should I? I'll finish this monologue on this powerful thought: Immortal have no original members. As that isn't an issue for the group, the band could actually last forever (quite literally making them Immortal), being replaced by musician after musician. How about that? Anywho... Bye!