

Hello, I am SO sorry for saying all sorts of crazy things about Keir Starmer and his guitar teaching adviser. Neither people own laboratories where they do weird experiments, including making hands grow out of people's faces and training small animals to use bazookas. And even if they did, it would be for benign reasons, I'm sure. The first experiment would quite literally be handy and would provide next level multitasking abilities, and the second experiment would be funny, adorable AND deadly to enemy forces. The enemy have laser cannons and weapons orbiting the Earth? Get the warrior gerbil in here now, and show the foes who's boss. I'd LOVE that! I wonder what the operations would be called, though. The first one could be called 'Operation Fingers' and the second called be called 'Operation Fluff!' Why be serious and name a mission 'Operation Overlord'? Overfluff, maybe! The two people don't turn people's skin green in 'a goof' either. My wording suggested that would be funny too, which says more about me the poor Keir. If someone looks at me funny? Turn their skin green, now THEY will get funny looks, which is justice isn't it? Amusing justice. If they look at really funny? Turn them green and give them extra fingers coming out of their cheeks. Again, that's who you treated me. Yes, you could say my views are the reasons for such looks, but look on the bright side, who else will be able to play guitar with their face??

Also, sorry to the adviser for suggesting he thought the British public are so stupid, they could be brainwashed by a leader simply playing basic power chords. I'd be impressed if Mr. Starmer could play a Guthrie Govan solo, though. How did he get so good so fast? You can't deny that's impressive, it's just how would such a performance improve the NHS? To other people, such playing would very likely be perceived as showing off. Again, how would that save the health services? 'Get the man who can outplay everyone in the world, right now!' Then the nurses would be like 'Why don't you play a nice tune instead of annoying everyone?' Again, it's not going to work, especially in a heatwave, anger makes people hotter. Keir Starmer gives people heatstroke after playing impressive solo? How's that for a headline? Maybe he could impress the more cerebral NHS bosses, though? As in 'I do like your playing, honestly. It's certainly very tuneful. It's just that... well, I'd prefer money...' Then Guthrie plays again and the boss forgives him and gets back to work. What song could be that powerful? I like his 'Waves!' The thing is though, it's an instrumental piece of music. Want a know a song that can really inspire people? 'Don't Stop Believin'" by Journey! Just don't play it to someone you know isn't going to recover. As in 'I'm never going to walk again, am I?' Then the song gets played by mistake, the patient gets his hopes up and then the nurses get embarrassed, red-faced and then they heat up again.

Now I'm going to apologise to Journey, your music isn't going to infuriate disabled people, that's an awful thing to say! I mean my music could ANNOY disabled people, but infuriate? I'd have to take my music down. I'm not sure why it would make people angry though, maybe 'boo!' means '(expletive) you' in another language, I do say it over and over and over again. It would also be inappropriate to play in a hospital, even if it didn't feature swear words. I arguably didn't say anything CRAZY about David Beckham when I said he just looks pretty and advertises crisps, in fact that's pretty much what I thought he did after retiring from football, as he surely has enough money already? Maybe he just got bored when he got involved with his later business endeavours.... Whatever the case, sorry for assuming he basically did nothing, too. I mean if he did just lay around doing nothing, I'd be very much reminded of that scene in The Wrestler where the retired fighter just sat playing old computer console games with him in. David on the other hand could play Playstation games he appeared in. Fun, but weird at the same time. Anyway, I'm sure he doesn't do that. He may eat his own brand of crisps, but that wouldn't be arrogant, I like crisps too, everyone does! And as everything has been cleared up... bye!
