

Simon: Hello, Simon! You have more randomness for me, I'm assuming?

Simon: Sure do.

Simon: Great! Let's goooo.

Simon: I've talked about water costing $100,000 in previous articles, but I never said what the review for it should be...

Simon: What should it be like?

Simon: Simply 'I can't taste a (expletive) difference.'

Simon: Imagine putting that on a product...

Simon: Yeah, well it would stop curious people selling their houses. It would be like a reporter saying 'Why are you homeless? Did you get shot and become disabled in Vietnam, making you unfit to work?', and the hobo going 'No, I just wanted to know what the best water in the world tasted like...' 'Is it any good?' 'Not really, no.'

Simon: Moving on, if you did so badly in school, how did you get into university?

Simon: When I was in college, I studied music performance, which isn't the hardest subject in the world. You can pass a lot of it with power chords and with musical diaries about your use of such chords. (i.e. did they work or not). Also, in college I retook maths and English... And that was it. So that's all you need. :S

Simon: Hard?

Simon: Not exactly, the maths was pretty much just addition and multiplication, and I didn't even fully understand what I was supposed to do in the other subject, because I was so out of it, at the time. The teacher just told me what to do on computer, as she sat next to me. Whatever I did, I passed. It was a bit embarrassing the way I was in a class full of people doing real A levels, and I was alone with constant supervision. A proper special needs child. :S

Simon: Now you're an educated English pro, and ex-special needs child, do you have any language observations?

Simon: Why do hypo (meaning 'below') and hyper (above) have to sound so similar? Isn't that confusing? A semi-conscious and slurring patient would be like 'I thiiink I gooot hyyyp-thermia when walking in the dessert...' The nurse would be like 'You got hypothermia in the desert?? Are you sure?' Misdiagnosed, the poor man dies.

Simon: What are you scared of?

Simon: Reality being a simulation. That would really annoy me. I mean what would be the point, really? I often think my life is so weird, it can't be real, so it's a bit of a real fear sometimes.

Simon: What do you think of Charles Bronson changing his name to Charles Salvador, his favourite artist?

Simon: A bit pretentious. It would be like me calling myself 'Simon Beethoven'.

Simon: No, don't do that, please...

Simon: I won't.

Simon: Phew. Any thoughts on cars?

Simon: I saw a car advertised as having climate control. Wow. What an interesting way to stop global warming.

Simon: :O How does it work?

Simon: I'm really not sure. I thought maybe opening the windows could help, but that's really dumb.

Simon: No, that wouldn't work at all.

Simon: I know, I know.

Simon: Do you have any thoughts on the evolution of hunting techniques?

Simon: Many years ago, I saw a computer simulation showing how the hunting techniques you're interested in, evolved in animals. Apparently at the start of animal kind, predators were so stupid they got chased by their prey at times as both animals figured out what to do. I think that's a bit unbelievable.

Simon: A bit random, but fine.

Simon: It was a random question...

Simon: Yep. Fair enough. How about your thoughts on prisoners?

Simon: I saw a Youtube video title saying 'The Real Reason Prisoners Wore Stripes.' I actually know why prisoners used to wear stripes, so I didn't need to watch it - To make them camouflaged in a field of zebras.

Simon: Is that true?

Simon: Yep, I think so.

Simon: Why??

Simon: No, only joking.

Simon: Oh.

Simon: I got a scam email with the exact words 'We're not gonna be able', etc. It was just warning me about something ridiculous. Imagine if all companies spoke like that. E.g. 'Oi mate, some fella's hacked into your account - gmail'.

Simon: Or 'Dude! You've just been ripped off, brah! - Halifax'.

Simon: I wonder what Siri would think if I played some death metal in the background. I guess nothing, as the growls are indecipherable, but say a more advanced Siri came out. What then? Would it accuse me of torturing people to death? That's not cool.

Simon: Could do. Or maybe of smashing people's faces with a hammer. That's a classic, the song even featured in Ace Ventura.

Simon: Weird.

Simon: Any thoughts about Eddie Van Halen's death?

Simon: Yes, not long (in the grand scheme of things) after he died, I noticed another numberplate with EVH on it. I could have written 'RIP' on the car, but not only would that be vandalism, it could be interpreted as a very serious threat, so I left it.

Simon: Very wise. What about your opinions on Myers-Briggs/socionics typing systems?

Simon: You really can't trust them. One site says Brad Pitt is an ENTj. 'Oh how interesting...' but another says ISFp, which is the exact opposite.

Simon: -_-

Simon: I don't know if this is true, but I heard people act like their opposite type if they're under stress...

Simon: Is Brad Pitt stressed?

Simon: Probably. I think everyone is...

Simon: Well there you go, then. Anything else on your mind?

Simon: Nope, that's it.

Simon: Ok. Byeeeeeee.
