

Hello! This time I would like to apologise to band Crosses. I previously said that because the Crosses CD I own has 'SUM422' written on its spine, it meant the band were saying they were more than ten times better than Sum 41. First, just because a number is bigger, doesn't mean it's better. For example, what temperature is better? A nice and snug 30 degrees celsius, or 30 million degrees? The latter is a million times worse maybe. (If you're sunbathing, anyway). And even if something mad happens in the world of physics/physiology and the extreme climate was an improvement somehow, I mean why would a band be so boastful? Even if one of greatest bands of all time, for example Pink Floyd said they were ten and a bit times better than a random punk pop band on their album cover, you'd just be like 'Ok... What are you trying to prove and why? Maybe you slipped on a banana skin in public, felt like an idiot and overcompensated?' That's basically what I thought. Not only that, I thought Crosses must have made some kind of detailed list explaining the strangely precise boast. In my view, they must have been like 'Well, Sum 41 aren't as melodic as us, so that's one way we're better. They don't fuse as many genres, so that's two. They aren't original as us' etc. A very obnoxious way of thinking. Kind of pathetic, really.

Now to apologise to Derren Brown, simply because I mentioned him a few other times in my site. You'd presume he wouldn't mind fame as he has appeared a lot on TV. Yeah? Let's see how he handles being talked about by me. I've already shamed Crosses, how about I shame Derren by accusing him of saying he's more than ten times better than David Blaine? It's a particularly dangerous thing for me to say because actually I do think he is. Sitting in a box for ages like David or convincing someone he was going through a zombie apocalypse like Brown, what sounds more impressive to you? Now to apologise to David Blaine. I just said he just stayed in a box for ages, actually he did so for a good 44 days. Not exactly a skill, but it was surely super boring. Interestingly people in jail get punished with solitary confinement which isn't so different. Did David ever break the law in front of a prison guard he came across and make a deal with him? Was he like 'Ok, I'll take the punishment. But why not punish me in a way both of us win? I'll give some of the money I make to you and all you have to do is imprison me, just a little differently than before.' Just speculation however, which is why I have to make my most sincere apology yet. Here goes: Sorry David for accusing you of a serious if mysterious crime, and now that I think of it, sorry for making up a prison guard who was corrupt. You do hear of corrupt policemen, but I'm sure they are rare and they NEVER help orchestrate elaborate stunts for TV and the general public. THAT'S a brazen crime that will damage the force's reputation.

Now who to apologise to? Oh yeah, I also accused band Crosses of being uncreative with their (very) similarly named album 'Crosses' and I compared them to a fictional car manufacturer called 'Car', making a vehicle called 'Car'. Having read those few sentences back to myself I realise that sounded crazy and super unreasonable, and I wonder what was going through my head when I made the comparison. Is that a form of projection as deep down I'M unreasonable? As explained I did once yell at someone (slightly) for adding what I (wrongly) thought was too much salt and vinegar to my meal. Actually to be honest, I've done that twice. So sorry to you, too. Furthermore, it's actually perfectly acceptable for bands to name releases after themselves. It seems my way of thinking is 'unique'. (Or 'demented'). People think the risk of crime is scary. Well what would you rather, take your chances walking at night alone, or think that way almost all the time? THAT'S fear. You can lie to yourself and call yourself 'special' and how cool that is, but expect a comedown when you boast about that to others and not only do they not celebrate, they nod, walk away and tell everyone what just happened. How do you feel special, then? And on that unhappy note, apology over!