

Simon: Hello! What's on your mind today?

Simon: You know power chords?

Simon: I do indeed. Chords with only a root and a fifth, and no third...

Simon: Yes, that's the definition. But at what point does a power chord stop being a power chord?

Simon: What do you mean?

Simon: Once you reach a certain pitch, the two notes sound really high and weedy.

Simon: Maybe they're still power chords, but power chords for pixies.

Simon: But Google's never even heard of pixie power chords... I've checked.

Simon: It's time to get your idea out, then.

Simon: For who?

Simon: Pixies, duh. If you invent a new style of music for them, you'll be a pixie hero.

Simon: For anyone else?

Simon: I doubt it. I've heard of lots of people taking metal music to the extremes by playing the lowest pitches possible, but not the other way round. It would be like listening to a dentist's drill and if you do that - and I know this is coming from me - you're a freak. Listening to dentist's drills is for freaks.

Simon: Do you think pixies like the drills?

Simon: Google?

Simon: Google doesn't know.

Simon: Google's not having such a great day, today.

Simon: I know! I'm wondering if Google knows anything about the creatures.

Simon: Google 'Does Google know pixies?'

Simon: It seems Google does not know pixies.

Simon: Google 'How good is Google?'

Simon: Google has been 'a runaway success'.

Simon: Ha.

Simon: I know.

Simon: Pixies will be outraged.

Simon: I'm outraged.

Simon: I wonder what other creatures have been neglected. No, not neglected, discriminated against. Google 'Does Google know goblins?'

Simon: It seems there are no matches.

Simon: Pathetic.

Simon: Orcs obviously love low-pitched music. I wonder if they like djent?

Simon: Maybe orcs play djent.

Simon: You know what to search for...

Simon: Google doesn't know. Again.

Simon: I'm in disbelief.

Simon: When do YOU think a power chord stops being a power chord?

Simon: Let's say an octave above the bottom E on a six string guitar.

Simon: That was easy. Makes you wonder if all the pixie talk was worth it...

Simon: Are YOU saying pixies don't matter?

Simon: No! I'm just saying things got a bit weird.

Simon: I wonder what pixies think of band 'The Pixies'.

Simon: Does the band play power chords?

Simon: I think so.

Simon: At what pitch?

Simon: I don't know. I think normal.

Simon: You know what, I don't think pixies would like The Pixies. I'm picturing the creatures listening 'Barbie Girl' by Aqua.

Simon: What about the deep male singing in the song?

Simon: That's for orcs.

Simon: If you're sure.

Simon: I'm sure.

Simon: You could say the song brings pixies and orcs together, which is nice.

Simon: No more epic Tolkienesque wars will be needed!

Simon: All because of 'Barbie Girl'.

Simon: That does sound strange.

Simon: I wonder if the author would write about the song if he was alive, today.

Simon: I'm not sure. I think that would ruin his reputation.

Simon: Not for me.

Simon: Are you sure? Say you were alive during WW2, and you see you Winston Churchill giving a serious speech, then him singing like a girl. You don't think that would be inappropriate?

Simon: It would lighten the mood.

Simon: No, other countries would have laughed at us.

Simon: Maybe at first, but when their defences were down, we could have attacked them...

Simon: To the tune of 'Barbie Girl' or something like that?

Simon: Yes.

Simon: If only the song was around at the time, many allied lives could have been saved.

Simon: A strange thought.

Simon: If the song was around in Viking times, you could expect a completely different battle cry.

Simon: Maybe the Vikings did high pitched battle cries, they just destroyed the evidence because they were embarrassed. Like 'if you tell ANYONE I sing like a girl, you're dead, and I will pillage your village.'

Simon: Google 'Did Vikings sing like girls?'

Simon: Apparently they sung love songs and lullabies...

Simon: Surely not whilst fighting??

Simon: Maybe they sung lullabies to their enemies and were mean to their friends, for the sake of being different?

Simon: Oh, I know the kind. Pranksters, do you mean?

Simon: Yeah. One minute their friends are nice and dry, then they open a door to find a cup of water lands on them.

Simon: Google 'Did Vikings hate each other?' Maybe that's how their empire fell apart.

Simon: Well, Vikings certainly did fight amongst each other, but the practical jokes and goofing around? I don't know...

Simon: Do another search...

Simon: Google doesn't know!

Simon: Not again!

Simon: Yes, either Google is really overrated, or you're asking some particularly odd questions.

Simon: I don't think I am.

Simon: Agreed.

Simon: I'm annoyed, now.

Simon: Me too.

Simon: Let's go.

Simon: Byeeeeeeeeeee.