

Have you ever been quietly judged for eating foods that aren't for your age range? I have. I often eat Kinder chocolates that are marketed for children (the word Kinder even means 'child') but how can a taste be childish?? Far from it, the chocolate is light and creamy. The same goes for eating jelly babies, (another name that causes at least some disapproval) everyone needs sugar in their diet and jelly babies give you all you need and more! That's not childish, when has a child ever given you all you need and more, or indeed anything without expecting something in return? You want some chocolates, is that what it is? No, they're for me. And not just the more 'manly' dark chocolates, it's all for me. Now I know I'm the one looking bad, and I should leave children alone, but I think they should go back to eating that strange paste you get, I can't remember what it's called. I get the feeling that tastes pretty good for adults as well. However, maybe eating that stuff at my age would be too far? I've just Googled paste for children as I wanted to know what product I ate as I child, but 'toothpaste' came up instead. I didn't mean children should eat toothpaste, that's abuse. Was I given apple paste or something like that? Let's Google 'apple paste for children'... No, apple toothpaste has come up. No wait! Apple puree! I think that's what I ate as an infant! And back to my point... how can apples be just for children no matter how they're served? I'm right, aren't I?

Adding to my point even further, 'organic apple puree is 100% natural', making it an even better option than many other foods with apples in them! It's certainly healthier than apple crumble, but you don't see me judging people who eat that. Who's childish for wanting to eat apple puree, now? Not me, I'm healthy. Yet, if I were to say to a shopkeeper 'I want to eat apple puree for kids because it's healthy and I don't care what you think of me' I'd probably be filmed and put on Youtube. I'd also probably get filmed if I snapped and had a go at people eating apple crumbles, which could happen. I've just Googled 'food for men' and red meat and Brazil nuts have come up. Wow, you're so manly, you really have to be very tough for eating meat and nuts. Yeah? Well I eat that too! So let me eat Jelly Babies in peace. What's manly about tomatoes, though?? Because they came up in my search, as well. Even weirder, 'chocolates' have come up. Not Kinder Surprise, but they haven't been ruled out at the same time. I get the impression no one really knows what to eat. My advice? Use your common sense. If a product is called 'Food for kids and if anyone else eats it, they're a complete clown' but it tastes good anyway? I say eat the food. On the other hand, if a product is called 'Food for real men and OG players' and it tastes like stale fish? Don't be tricked by the marketing and give it a miss!

Having said that, there are probably people who do eat stale fish. I know there are in fact, the fish is called 'Sustromming'. It tastes like the worst thing in the world imaginable to me, but some people swear by it. Wow, fish that has been left to rot to the point it tastes absolutely disgusting and smells even worse, you don't think a very clever marketing campaign is involved? 'Surstromming' probably means 'total legend' or something similar. In comparison, there was famously a racing 'game' called 'Big Rigs' that was absolutely riddled with massive glitches, one of the tracks doesn't even load at all and the other racing cars just stand still for the whole races. But Big Rigs SOUNDS cool. If the game was called 'Piece of Trash -_- ' no one would have ever bought it. I think by law that's what the game should have called and the fish should be labelled as 'Disgusting, rancid and highly questionable food, even for dogs.' But of course, who would ever buy that without feeling embarrassed? Yeah? That's how I feel when I eat chocolate and jelly babies!!!! Fancy calling chocolate

'child', even if it is in an another language. How would butch bodybuilders feel if their favourite steak was called 'meat for babies'? Kinder Surprise should be called 'Manly Surprise' (there's nothing wrong with surprises, so that word can stay) and Jelly Babies should be called 'Multicoloured Statues of Bigheaded Jelly Warriors', because that's what they look like! And on that thoughtful note... Bye!
