

Hello, this time I would like to apologise for suggesting Japanese girls are running the world from behind the scenes. To be fair, it could explain the popularity of Barbie dolls, but there's just something dark about anyone running anything in secret. Why are the crime rates going up? MAYBE Japanese girls are defunding the police? Why? So they can spend the money saved on more dolls. Again, not very likely is it? I actually have proof such people aren't running the world: Why are there no pink flags? Similarly, there are no pink military uniforms, secret agents don't dress in pink, etc., etc. Ever seen videos of dictatorships, where a madman rants about something crazy, the audience look scared, and behind the crazy person are a dozen or so Japanese girls looking serious? Because I haven't. As in 'You better say what I want you to or you're not getting any dolls' and as the madman is mad obviously, he HATES that idea. However, some girls don't like being perceived that way, explaining the apology.

I wonder what things would be like if I was working behind the scenes... Well, what are the things I enjoy the most and what are MY favourite colours? That would be going to the gym, eating and listening to music, and my favourite colours are black and green. When the colours are combined with each other? Perfect. So my flag? A black background, a green knife and fork, green headphones and a green action man riding a green tank. Ever seen that before? No? That's proof I'm not working behind the scenes, because I'd arrange that immediately. Ever heard of a flag that gets you excited? Wow. I just thought I had to point that out as some people think I look shady. I have seen green tanks and soldiers, but that's because of camouflage obviously. If I painted a tank green it probably would be for aesthetic reasons. Japanese writing looks cool as well, so why not have Japanese words painted on tanks in red, that would look cool. But then of course, Japanese girls would get the blame again, and again, that would be because of me. Readers may be wondering why I'm trying to demonise such people and I'm honestly not!

Quite the opposite in fact, such people are often known for being extra talented. For example, there are Youtube videos of them shredding as good as Guthrie Govan and doing sums faster than Stephen Hawking. However, I'm just putting the thought out there that with a strong gift comes a tradeoff and I'm wondering what that could be. Not evil, I've ruled that out, maybe they're just really annoying, but that's slander, too. So I'll move on. Here's a thought: Why do people assume those working behind the scenes are doing something wrong? If I was a spy, sometimes I'd simply wonder what's going on with my pizza order. I've pointed this out before but I'll say it again. On the Papa John's site, you can get a message telling you how ready your order is, and apparently the pizzas get 'checked' for about ten minutes or even longer. Sometimes the message says the order has been delivered when it hasn't. If I was a spy, I'd get to the bottom of that. I wouldn't brainwash the population by putting what is more or less toothpaste in the water.

I guess I should stress as much as is possible that if a young girl or indeed anyone has a desire to be really good at something, that doesn't point to something dark. There is the risk I could be making schoolchildren paranoid. As in 'Why is Tsumugi good at maths and carrying a pink pen? Is she designing her own flag of evil?' Again... No. Not. At. All. A black pen could be a cause for concern though, especially if the flag has a picture of a knife or gun. No, you know what? Even that would be fine, as there is a flag that does have a sword on it, and that is completely harmless.

It IS harder to defend a flag where someone is getting shot in the face, though. Tsumugi, the problem child. Also, I'm sorry to everyone in the world called 'Tsumugi'. If my name was mentioned in a story about designing the disturbing flag just mentioned, I would be both upset and angry. At least I didn't mention a whole name, though. If someone described a situation where someone called Simon Jonathan Wiedemann designed a crazy flag, I'd be legit traumatised. At least I didn't do something like that. And on that happy note... Bye!