

Simon: Hello! Have you ever pranked a friend?

Simon: Yes, when I was about 14, I filled my darkened room completely with smoke (I have a smoke machine), and I planned on opening the curtains to create a flash of light where nothing else is seen...

Simon: I don't understand...

Simon: Shortly before opening the curtains, I said 'did you hear the news that a nuke is about to go off?', but judging by my friend's face, he believed me, which was sad. It kind of spoiled the mood. Then I opened my curtains, which did create the effect I was going for, but my friend just looked at me like I was an idiot. So that didn't really go very well.

Simon: Wow.

Simon: Yeah.

Simon: Any lighter pranks?

Simon: Just putting plastic cups filled with water on doors, so when you move them, the stuff falls on you. I did that a lot with my friend when I was in a mental home, and believe it or not, it was kind of tolerated. :O

Simon: That's a nicer story.

Simon: Yes, I agree. Far less horrifying. :S

Simon: What do you think of 'mystery flavours' of drinks, or of packets of crisps or whatever?

Simon: They sound interesting, but to me, it suggests the companies don't really know what they're doing. It's like a modern artist throwing loads of paint over a canvass, and someone asking what's it's supposed to be. The artist would be like 'Errr... it's a mystery painting.'

Simon: Do you know of any quotes that need clarification?

Simon: Yes, you know the saying 'Life isn't a bowl of cherries'?

Simon: Uh-huh?

Simon: It should be 'Life isn't a bowl of cherries, unless you're a cherry with your cherry friends'.

Simon: Much better. What's the most dramatic experience you've had recently?

Simon: When leaving the gym, I saw about six police cars and two police bikes in the car park, right next to my car. I was thinking 'Errr... Have I done something wrong?', but what I actually said to the police was something like 'That's my car!!' Thank God I didn't commit a crime without me knowing, the police were there for a completely different reason. I asked what was going on, but they didn't tell me. I guess doing so would be unprofessional. No one really wants a gossiping policeman.

Simon: Have you seen any silly signs recently?

Simon: Yes, I saw a sign saying 'Don't bang your head', but you'd have to be about 7 foot tall to do so. In that case, you really should be used to the threat of hitting yourself.

Simon: Great stuff. And do you have an interesting insult for me?

Simon: Pog thief.

Simon: Do you have any thoughts on strange band names?

Simon: How come everyone says the music group 'Nerd' as the letters N, E, R, D, and not former even though it's clearly a real word, yet people say 'Ratm' instead of 'Rage Against the Machine', and 'Ratm' is meaningless?

Simon: ?

Simon: Maybe a N, E, R, D member was like 'Oh no, do you know what our band name sounds like? Instead of 'No one Ever Really Dies', it could sound like 'Nerd'... The other band members would be like 'No, I don't think it looks like that at all. We'll keep calling ourselves the single letters.' What's really bugging me, is the disagreeing members were right to do so.

Simon: -_- Have you ever seen a confused emergency ambulance driver?

Simon: I think so. I saw one performing a U-turn on a roundabout, perhaps suggesting he wasn't sure where to go. I wonder if the patient realised...

Simon: Great stuff. What's the stupidest TV show you've seen?

Simon: The Bidding Room is easily one of them. All that happens in it, is people bring in items to be valued, the items do get valued, and then the stars of the show buy the things. That's it. You don't even get to hear what happens to the items in the end, making the show particularly pointless. It's a like a quiz show where the host asks the contestants questions and THAT'S IT. You never get to hear if the responses are correct or not.

Simon: Have you ever thought of a way of influencing people? Maybe fast food customers?

Simon: Yes, put pictures of Arnold Schwarzenegger next to the cheap products to make people want to buy them, and pictures of the same man in a space suit and with a rocket launcher, to make people REALLY want to buy the more expensive items.

Simon: Wow, Arnold with a rocket launcher? That's totally badass.

Simon: That's exactly my point. I don't know if it's legal, but you could enter your rival's business, and draw pictures of Stalin covered in spiders next to their products to stop people from buying them.

Simon: Great! Is that all from you?

Simon: Yep, byeeeeeeeeeee.