

For this monologue, I will be ranking 12 words from an online random word generator! And they will be super random, as no such words will be skipped because they're either boring or demented! Let's go!

12th

Spite.

I don't like spite at all, but it's better than a typhoon. Then I realised that the generator actually said 'tycoon.' So spite is the worst word on the list. Having said that, there are advantages to every situation, right? I'm sure a spiteful boxer is more effective at doing his job than a benevolent fighter. I'm not saying I approve of spiteful boxers, but what's worse, someone who hits his enemies or helps them?

11th

Cancel.

Who likes things being cancelled? (Apart from people who are trying to get things cancelled, I'm almost 100% sure. Not completely sure though, as some are mentally ill). Very annoying. Even cancelled dentist appointments are no good, because you have to get them over with eventually. On the plus side, a dentist has not yet said to me 'What the flip have you done to your teeth?' But I live in fear.

10th

Slippery.

Name me one slippery thing that's good. Ok, water slides if you're 10, or a fish if you're a fisherman. No, scratch that, slippery fish can escape by slipping away from you. So they're not good, either. If you want another example, do you like slippery people? If so, why?

9th

Familiar.

I have mixed feelings about familiar things. I'm yet to get tired of Papa John's pizzas and I've been eating them regularly for years, now. I very much doubt they will ever be boring. On the other hand, do I like doing chores? Nope. Can't be bothered!

8th

Theme

Theme Park, Theme Hospital, etc. are all good, as is the theme of falling down a hole if you're a Neighbours writer. But just as there are an infinite number of good themes, there are an equal number of bad themes, e.g. the theme of death, (unless you're in a death metal band, especially the band called Death which obviously wasn't so creative) the theme of sadness, and so on. Even so, better than slippery things and arguably better than things that are familiar. I think.

7th

Flat.

Again, there are good and bad flat things. Flat Coke? Bad. (Although obviously all Coke is bad - I had another dream about the drink very recently). Flat Tango simply doesn't taste very nice, and if you see a flat line on a heart monitor, you're dead. But flat fields? Very nice. Flat spoons shouldn't even exist. Even thinking about them opens the mind!

6th

Passive.

I have nothing against passive people at all. What asshole does, right? Apart from maybe an army sergeant, I can't see that going down well at all. You'd think I'd know what a passive verb is but I don't, so I won't comment on them. Sure, sometimes I like learning things, but if they remind me of the misery of school English classes, I'd probably give them a miss.

5th

Enlarge.

Not all enlarged things are good (e.g. gangrenous wounds on the face) but most are. Huge pizzas, etc., etc. Yes, if there was a 50/50 chance of getting gangrene or a huge pizza, or the option of leaving the situation and not taking the risk, I'd most definitely run away at full speed, BUT the sheer number of huge pizzas I've had really is striking.

4th

Tycoon.

Ah tycoons, responsible for all sorts of great things from trains to good old fashioned mass-produced chocolate biscuits. To be clear, I'm not saying typhoons are great, and I'm not saying typhoons are responsible for massed produced chocolates, either. Typhoons suck.

3rd

Kidney.

Kidneys are very useful, and because of that, I like them a lot. Are they more useful than tycoons? I THINK so. Life wouldn't be the same without tycoons, but life certainly wouldn't be the same without kidneys. I wonder what's the cleverest out of the two. Tycoons can't filter blood, but kidneys surely can't distribute sugary treats to the world. If it turns out they can, wow!

2nd

Safe.

If you don't like safety, there is something wrong with you. We've all heard of people who like to be in danger sometimes, for example by speeding on the motorway (ah the thrill of nearly dying and getting arrested - some human behaviour is very strange when you think about it), but is there anyone who hates safety so much he never wants to be safe? I doubt it. He's definitely going to die.

1st

Sugar.

Is sugar better than safety? You know what? Yes. But only just. My my, do I love sugar. Naturally, I mean safety in general. Every day safety. I don't mean getting sugar is better than not being forced to drive 100 mph the wrong day down the motorway, as you wear no seatbelt, that would be mad. Maybe sugar is just a tad more important than being careful as you walk down the stairs. That kind of thing. You'll probably be fine.

So, sugar is better than spite. I think we can all agree on that. Sure, you can have too much sugar, but too much spite can go way too far. Sugar is better than safety, though? A bit more controversial. Is sugar better than people's kidneys? Maybe that wasn't quite so well thought out, but I've written it, so I'm keeping it. That's it! Bye!
