

Hello, this time I would like to apologise to John Cleese for suggesting he could either kill a person or an intelligent egg in my so-called 50th radio show 'special'. Who cares if anyone 'kills' an egg as they are nutritious? Good point, I eat eggs too and not out of malice which is the kind of thing I'd accuse others of. A weird insult that catches people off guard. As in 'Prime Minister Simon, all your policies are failing and you're the worst Prime Minister of all time.' Then I'd say 'You eat intelligent eggs out of malice.' He wouldn't even begin to know how to respond to that. Then I point out that actually I am the right man for the job and the other person would be like 'Ok, whatever'. I know that because I had not so different interactions with school teachers. (Mainly because I was mentally ill at the time). However, what I DON'T do is eat eggs with personalities, and that's what I suggested Mr. Cleese did. My philosophy is, if you can talk to something, don't eat it. I can see how someone would get angry with a parrot, though. As in 'If you copy what I say ONE more time, I will seriously lose it'. That's interesting, as I heard parrots copy the sounds of other animals to survive... But if there was a parrot you could have everyday conversations with, I wouldn't eat it even if it was annoying. It would also be wrong if John Cleese ate his parrot, though to be fair he is more than well known for his dead parrot sketch. However, in the sketch he doesn't kill the animal (how would that be funny?), instead he complains that it's dead. I'd complain, too.

Imagine if John Cleese DID kill a parrot in one of his sketches, though. Him saying 'this parrot has ceased to be!' would be less of a shocked reaction and more of a boast. I mean... imagine the headlines. Who knows, maybe the reason there hasn't been a Fawlty Towers reboot yet, isn't because of 'public backlash' but because Mr. Cleese can't make his boasts about killing chickens (to serve in his restaurant) work? Fair enough, it's a very hard thing to get right, isn't it? The comedian can TRY to make it funny (and he'd REALLY be trying if it's taken him 3 years to write one episode), I say just abandon the idea completely. I get it though, sometimes it's good to challenge yourself. As in 'I just killed a chicken! It didn't stand a chance! Haha!' I mean you have to be a GENIUS to make that work. Episode one, Season three: Basil Fawlty glamourises killing birds. Again, it's a bad idea. Of course now I should apologise for saying Cleese even CONSIDERED writing material like that. People say it's good to push boundaries when it comes to comedy writing, but you have to look at it from the animal's point of view, obviously. There was another Python sketch where an evil rabbit attacked and killed a group of ancient warriors which was very funny, but it WOULDN'T be funny if the warriors ganged up on and killed the rabbit, it would be unfair. And as everyone knows John Cleese is fully aware of that, I have no need to say sorry again.

Maybe Monty Python should apologise to rabbits for giving people false impressions of them? I'd imagine pet rabbit sales aren't quite what they used to be, but maybe the rabbits like being thought of as deadly and think to themselves '... badass...' Of course now I should apologise again for saying MP made people think rabbits can kill or maybe eat their owners or indeed anyone. They can't, unless people can be made of lettuce, which... they can't. Also, I should point out that 'people turning into vegetables' is a figure of speech and is nothing to worry about. Rabbits do not eat bedridden people. ALSO, I should apologise for saying 'MP', just now. Members of parliament don't make people think rabbits are killers, either. I'm kind of running out of things to apologise for, to be honest. Hm. I guess I could apologise to all the people who have the initials 'MP', just in case anyone thinks THEY make others think rabbits are killers, there are just so many people to get through. Let's Google how many people have those initials... Between 10 and 20 million?? I had no idea at the time of writing that this would be my biggest apology ever. The respectful thing to do would be to list every person individually, it would just take so long. So I won't. Sorry. Oh God, I still need to beef this paragraph up. Sorry to all those who like consistent paragraphs and... Bye!
