

I once tapped on my mobile phone and it flashed at the exact same time, almost like a secret feature. Like a hidden area in a video game that gets unlocked by a password. 'Secret Flash', a great name for a band. Sadly 'flash' has another meaning, a rude meaning, and 'Secret Flash' isn't any better. What can I do about that problem, if anything? Hm. Maybe there's another word for flash that doesn't have the negative connotation. Let's Google some synonyms of 'flash'. Ok, we have 'shine'... Secret Shine! That's kinda catchy, isn't it? Sadly however, shine doesn't really describe the experience of tapping a phone and it lighting it up for a split second. It KIND of does, but shines usually last longer, right? Light up is another synonym but it has the same problem and it isn't catchy, either. Next up is 'sparkle'. Secret Sparkle? Sounds like the name of girly pop band, so that's out of the question. Secret Twinkle is even worse. Spark really doesn't describe the situation of a mobile flashing, if sparks came out of my phone I'd be horrified.

Success! Secret Flicker works perfectly without it being at all rude! To be fair, it still could be the name of a girl band, but not necessarily! Could be a rock band! Flickers don't last long, hardcore punk songs often don't last long, so it works there, too! It's not a hardcore sounding name like Dirty Rotten Imbeciles, or Septic Death, but does that really matter? You can't be hardcore all the time and one has to ask if it's really appropriate for a 36 year old man to be hardcore. Maybe going to gym is hardcore, fine, but a better word to describe the gym is 'fun'. All in all, maybe I should leave the whole idea of me spiking my hair up and shouting about the government. I'm actually grateful for all the work they do with the free NHS! Some of the hardcore punk band names I've found are rather intriguing, though. What in the world does the music of Gorilla Biscuits sound like? Well, let's find out now. But first of all, what is Gorilla Biscuits best song? Let's see if the power of AI can help me. 'Start Today' has just been recommended to me. It's not as whacky sounding as I'd hoped, but let's give it a try! Oh. Actually it was pretty good. The band pulled me in with a weird band name and quickly earned themselves a fan. Well done, them.

What do Septic Death sound like, then? Wow, that guitar solo was terrible and the Youtube comments say Metallica's Kirk Hammett played it? Call me paranoid, but it sounds like Kirk deliberately tried to make the band sound worse. Why do that? Elimination of a rival. Slayer's Kerry King did a similar thing by spoiling the end of Pantera song 'Goddamn Electric' where he copies Kirk's approach by basically making noises on the instrument, but taking the idea further. Why Kerry was chosen in the first playing is a mystery as he's not known for his brilliant guitar solos and Pantera's guitarist is. That's a weird one. It's like replacing the singer of The Beatles with a drunk guy who doesn't know what he's doing. It's an interesting idea don't get me wrong, but it results in bad music, obviously. Anyway, so we have my band 'Secret Flicker' that sings about the joys of the NHS and how I don't have to pay for my brain medicine. I could write songs like 'No Septic Death, Because I Got Treated for Free.' That's nice, isn't it? Maybe The Sex Pistols would have went easier on the queen is she cured illnesses, but I've never heard of her ever doing that. Just a thought for king Charles.

Moving on, I've never even heard of Myanmar until recently, the country is huge! It's actually more than twice the size of the UK... Thankfully that doesn't mean me not hearing of the country is two and a half times as bad as me not hearing of the UK as the country is very far away from the UK. Wow, I've never even heard of the country

I'm living in, even though it's more than two and half times bigger than I thought it was, that's not cool. I mean if I did think that, what is going on with the English educational system? Similarly, if Myanmar was right next to England like France is, there would simply be no excuses there either. But it's not, so maybe it doesn't matter. Me not hearing of America would be mental, especially as I've been to the place. I hate to sound entitled, but if I didn't hear of the country even after going there, I would be kinda mad at the English education system yet again. You could argue my lack of knowledge is my fault, you could make a case that something with my teachers was amiss.

I've also spent some time Googling massive numbers. There is a number called TREE(3) that apparently has so many zeros it's impossible to know how many there are. Even the person who invented it doesn't know? That's weird to me, as if I spent ages creating my own number, I'm sure someone out there would explain it and have a better name for it. Maybe Simon1 or Simon2 for the updated version. When I think of numbers, I don't think of trees. Think 3,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 doesn't have a name because that's too big? Nope, forget Simon2, it's 3 septillion. Well that's what it's called in America, complicating things even further, the UK septillion is much bigger. I'm wondering what the UK version of TREE(3) is. It's like the original version that is so huge you can't comprehend it, but it's much bigger than that? Does TREE(3) have any practical uses? Apparently no, so what's the point wondering how many zeros it has??? That's the behaviour of a madman, what kind of person wonders how many numbers the biggest number in the world has when he knows it's pointless??? I kinda want to know too, but if someone told me it's too big to understand I'd let it go. Do something useful like count people's money. Best cashier ever. And on that realistic note... Bye!