

Simon: Hi. Written any nonsensical jokes, recently?

Simon: Yip, here's one: What guitar company banned the letter? I ban Z.

Simon: What's it supposed to mean?

Simon: For whatever reason and for a god few minutes, I thought the letter 'Z' wasn't pronounced zed, but 'ez'.

Simon: I ban ez?

Simon: Right! I thought of an improvement, it's not perfect but I think it is understandable: What guitar company banned the letter? I ban S.

Simon: I ban ess?

Simon: Good enough for you?

Simon: Not sure...

Simon: Imagine if I was in America, the joke would read as 'I ban zee', which is terrible. I guess I could have made a punchline that goes 'I ban Ed', but again, not perfect.

Simon: -_-

Simon: On the plus side it's not just me screwing up, I watched an episode of hospital drama Casualty recently, and wow...

Simon: What happened?

Simon: It's not that it wasn't action-packed, but yeah, it was super dumb. To start the show, an everyday boyfriend and girlfriend were in a room together, as the former played with his sword. He was like 'look at this trick I can do' or whatever and he accidentally cut his lady friend's fingers off. In the hospital, a doctor told another doctor the person's fingers were cut off by a samurai sword, and the boyfriend said 'actually it was a katana...' like it was 100% normal. An 'experienced' doctor fainted a couple of seconds after seeing the finger, a small girl took one of the fingers and hid with it in a cupboard, it was just hard to take seriously.

Simon: Do you have any colour theories?

Simon: Yes! I was watching women's football recently, and England wore white (the colour of peace) and Austria wore black (the colour of power). Austria should have won, right? Ah, but on the other hand, you could say it was a battle of good and evil, and an optimist would say England should have won. And you know what?

Simon: What?

Simon: Good did win!

Simon: Awesome.

Simon: In the match, I saw a slogan saying 'Not Womens Football' which confused me. Not just because I was watching a women's event, but also because there was no apostrophe in 'Womens'. Very odd.

Simon: Hm.

Simon: Tennis players always seem to wear white suggesting there are no such people who are evil. For whatever reason, most of the audience in the Wimbledon games (nearly typed as 'Wombledon') also wore white. I wonder if when you die and go to Heaven, the first thing you see is tennis...

Simon: What's the dumbest thing you've ever done?

Simon: When I was 6, I was in a swimming pool and I got tired of the shallow end. I really wanted to go on a rubber slide that went into the deep end, so I planned on grabbing the slide's exit and pulling myself to safety. Of course it's extremely difficult to grab hold of soaking wet rubber, but I didn't realise that at the time. Making things worse, I couldn't swim. A lifeguard had to stop me from drowning...

Simon: :O

Simon: I'm fairly sure I've never topped that.

Simon: Do you think you ever will?

Simon: Nope.

Simon: Oh good.

Simon: I thought I was about to see a news presenter fist bump the guy he was interviewing, but sadly he just hit the air.

Simon: Where did that come from?

Simon: I've just been watching the news.

Simon: Oh thank God.

Simon: Yep, makes sense, doesn't it?

Simon: So much sense. Maybe you'd like to take this opportunity to say something even more logical?

Simon: Good razor blades are important. If you press too hard with a used blade you will get lots of cuts, and you'll look like a drug addict.

Simon: A very bad look for a job interview, for example...

Simon: Yes. Or if you're leading an anti-drugs campaign.

Simon: Hypocrite.

Simon: Exactly. I've had an idea for a gameshow...

Simon: Go on...

Simon: You get a choice of an easy question earning you £1,000 if you get it right. On the other hand, if you choose a harder one, you earn 10 trillion pounds. Shown as £10,000,000,000,000. I just think it's funny seeing all those noughts.

Simon: What's an example of a hard question?

Simon: What number between 0 and a million octillion am I thinking of? It could have a up to a billion decimal places.

Simon: What number are you thinking of, out of curiosity?

Simon:

673,992,536,111,120,277,772.8585853737858384757384858586867575868684858
686848485837

Simon: I was well off.

Simon: What were you thinking of?

Simon: Ten.

Simon: Want another try?

Simon: No thank you. What's the weirdest name you've heard?

Simon: Gear Hard Burger is pretty weird, though I later found out it's spelt 'Gerhard Burger'.

Simon: What's a gear hard burger?

Simon: I don't know. I guess a burger as hard as a gear.

Simon: Fair enough. Anything else on your mind?

Simon: Nope.

Simon: Ok. Byeeee.