

Dan, screw you. What have you done wrong this time? You gave me the idea of drawing a clock on the first second of the year 2,000 and now I can't stop looking at it. Not only that, it's not real anyway! Not only am I living a lie, people are telling me the lie I'm living is total crap, just like you said! And then, and THEN you had the cheek to retract your apology? Well I'm retracting mine! Ok you said I wasn't really apologising to you in the first place and that I was actually trying to make you angry. Well done, you saw through me. Well how's about this for making you angry: I've been writing 'Dan is an idiot' 100 times every day for the past few years. I'm actually planning on turning my work into a full blown novel. Repetitive sure, but it's avant-garde too, much like James Joyce's 'Finnegans Wake' and for that reason, I think it will do very well. Better, even. Am I saying I'm smarter than the other James (who has a fantastic first name, by the way)? Yes, because the title should actually be 'Finnegan's Wake' note the apostrophe. My title on the other hand? 'Dan sucks'? That's grammatically perfect.

To end the book, I'm planning on inventing an epic new word, again like James Joyce would have done. Maybe you'd like to figure out its meaning? Here you go Dansucksdansuckdansucksdansucksfoolfoolfoolhesuckrightdansucks. Also like Mr. Joyce, my book will be written in multiple languages, e.g. Dan est in imbecile. NOW are you angry? If so, good. If not, here's another language for you: Dan es un idiota. Maybe the book could do with a twist to spice things up? Maybe I could say 'Dan's great!' and call him a fool again. What makes the idea particularly deep and profound is the fact I did so in real life. Not only would the novel be entertaining and cathartic, it's the kind of thing psychiatrists could study for their doctorate. Why various agents have rejected my book's proposal and called the police will have to remain a mystery. If I had to guess, it was because I come across as abusive and stalkerish. THAT'S profound. Am I getting a big head like you, though? Maybe I am, but heads are useful, aren't they. Not like yours that is filled with hate.

On second thoughts, does Finnegans Wake really need an apostrophe? Spell checker says it does, but then again, my grammar checker said 'not only am I living a lie' should really be 'not only is/are I living a lie.' I guess computers aren't right ALL the time. Unless it really should be 'I is living a lie'. Sounds like Ali G, doesn't it? He may come across as an idiot to some people, but his use of language is apparently pretty good. If someone ever says 'I is going to get you' forget about correcting his grammar, there's nothing wrong there whatsoever, just focus on getting to safety. Here's a phrase for you, Dan: I is going to get you.' Wow, it's exactly the same, how about that? What are the odds, right? Here's another phrase for you that is also apparently fine: 'I are going to get you.' That suggests there's more than one of me. Is the thought of a gang of my clones attacking you getting to you? Don't lie, it has to be.

Ohhhh I have an idea. I may not be able to create clones of myself YET, but how about I send you lots of pictures of me?? Then people would ask you 'why are so obsessed with someone who keeps calling you a fool in different languages?' I'd like to hear your answer to that one. Even if you tell the truth and explain exactly what happened, you'd only be giving me more attention which in itself is bad for you as you think I like it, and I do. Also, they'd be wondering why everything I say about you is bad. Maybe because I'm crazy? Well if I'm so crazy, why aren't I in a mental home? Because no one wants me there? Yes that is true, but my point is, it just sounds counterintuitive right? You'd expect mental treatment for everyone, even if they were annoying! The thought any old lunatic could be released simply because the staff can't put up with them is a dystopian nightmare that I can blame on people like you who keep trying to ignore me. :P And on that angry note... bye!