

Water is Running Out!

I know this isn't an appropriate way to start a news program, but... AAAARGH! Now that gyms have reopened, people are drinking more water than ever just so they don't dehydrate, and that is having a devastating impact on the ecosystem!! :S Whilst it's true that most of the planet was once covered with water, all that remains now is the stuff you get in swimming pools, a few protected lakes, and a number of what have been described as 'rows of puddles' for boats to sail on. They look normal, but are actually only 1 foot deep, which is why no one has drowned in 5 years. A few people have been treated for 'very wet ankles' and many had thought they were going mad, but to be clear, no deaths. All the satellite images of oceans and seas are fake news. As the world is inhabited by billions of people and God knows how many animals all equally dependent on water, it's estimated mankind has just weeks left before people with bloody noses are stalked and harassed, and people who have colds have their noses licked. Disgusting, I know, but desperate times call for desperate measures.

There is hope, however. A small percentage of the population are willing to watch sad films and have their tears licked for a small fee. Furthermore, apparently ice is found on the moon, and ice can be melted down into the water that is so essential. You just have to watch out for 'burnt water', which is basically the same, it just tastes different. I assume it's tastes something like toast. Well it probably does. It must do. However, amateur astronauts estimate the moon is about the size of a large coin. Sometimes a little larger, sometimes a little smaller. It just keeps changing size. However, it is hoped there may be bigger moons out there. Grapes have water inside them, which is also promising. Coconuts are filled with some form of liquid too, but personally, I wouldn't go near the stuff. Lava is a liquid technically speaking, but it's really hot and when it cools down, it solidifies, anyway. >:(

News just in! It has been explained that the astronauts are complete idiots, the moon is actually very big. It's estimated that there should be enough water on the thing to last the Earth many many years. There are plans to drag the moon to the Earth so the former can be harvested, which sounds difficult, but in space nothing weighs anything. Well that's what the amateur astronauts said. Why are we listening to them again? Everyone deserves a second chance. They also suggest that rain is a gift from aliens from a distant planet. How does it stay in clouds for so long without falling to the ground? Well, it's from space, isn't it? And things from space don't weigh anything. News just in, the same people have now been gagged and taunted. No third chances.

More news in! Apparently the Queen is now living on an iceberg in Antarctica with an icepick and a kettle. She really hates it. On the plus side, she has made friends with a number of penguins who consider her trustworthy. That's in contrast to the first explorers of the area who have gone down in penguin legend as extremely selfish and even murderous. Many of such birds were slain, and for what? The birds assumed simply for curiosity and for the sake of doing something new. Was exploring the area really necessary? Probably not. Ok! That's it from me, now it's time to go to the journalist who is covering the world's air problem. Hello? Are you there? No? Oh no, he's fainted. I'm feeling faint too, actually. Anyone got a glass of water? No? I notice you have a runny nose, cameraman... Would you mind if I...?

Oh forget it th.....