A short while ago, I read on the news that the police are 'tired of seeing crime.' I'm wondering what's worse, a good person who hates seeing crime and gets bored with dealing with it, or a hard working policeman who because of a lack of morals, loves crime. Say someone robbed your house, what would you prefer? Someone saying how terrible it was, with genuine sympathy but also saying he really can't be bothered to deal with the case, or someone eager to help you but who is also eager to rob you? I'm wondering what could be done in both of those scenarios. Maybe a pay rise for the first guy so he's more motivated, and a pay rise for the second guy so he doesn't want to steal as much. However, he could just commit another crime instead, like assault. And I suppose simply giving people more money is a rather oversimplified solution to a problem. Having said that, can you think of a problem money can't solve? It's a tough one, which I suppose is why people value money so much. Maybe there is a mysterious material under our noses right this second that is even better than money, maybe even a food? Maybe tomatoes mixed with honey and pepperoni? Who knows right, so let's get experimenting.

You know what the worst policeman possible is? One who hates work, but loves crime. People say society is getting worse now, but at least it isn't THAT bad. Policemen who burn your house down, politicians who fund wars, not against other countries, but against your hometown, and fireman who don't use water but petrol, THAT'S stuff to be concerned about. Luckily, I can't see that ever happening. Of course minimum speed signs of 200 mph etc., are possible, but only in special circumstances. I've gone into enough details about the hypothetical police, now I'll talk more about the nightmare government. In the worst case possible, they could demand all the money you earn from work. How would that make you feel, right? First an organisation takes everything from you, and then they use your cash to start an illegal war against you. Of course you have no chance of winning as you're not allowed to own weapons! Then the firefighters arrive and they cut all the nearby trees down, not to save stuck cats no, no, but to add fuel to the fire caused by the government's ultra modern F-35s that you helped pay for.

But people don't usually experience crime increases suddenly, but gradually over time, right? So if you ever see a policeman doing something mildly shifty like littering, call him a scumbag and run away, just so he clearly knows it's wrong. Or maybe, that would enrage him. Good luck getting him to solve the burglary case now, you're well and truly screwed. Maybe you could try taking on the criminals yourself? Well if the police are relative saints when compared to outlaws, God knows how bad the latter are. I thought it was a crime when the fighter jets blew the civilian's houses up. Nope, they're people to be respected. Now what to say? Ah yes, evil medics, what would they be like? I'll tell you what an evil healthcare worker with no money would be like, they could examine you for any serious injuries and when it turns out you have none? Then they injure you just so they can get paid for their subsequent work. In their minds it doesn't really matter as they sorted the problem out for you, but that's not the point, obviously. The point is that operations are very, very stressful and breaking someone's arm then treating it for example, is morally awful, even if it is good for the economy. And on that dark note… Bye!
