

People often complain that politicians aren't like regular people, but I wouldn't want a politician to be like me. Take this idea of mine: Drug the water so people are happier and consequently commit less crimes. That's controversial. Sure I mean well, but needless to say there are many people who don't like the idea of being constantly high, e.g. priests, school teachers, judges, space scientists and doctors. You don't want people getting addicted to water, either. Sure it's a healthy drink, but if you do drink ALL the time, it is a wasted life. But to be fair, I believe fluoride is in the water already, and that's good for your teeth. Therefore you could argue me drugging the water could lead to a quality in dental health the world has never seen before. If you've read my One Screwy Day stories, you'll know one of my ideas is to let everyone in the country make their own rules, to take democracy as far as possible. Can you imagine say a toddler, forcing people to obey one his minimum speed limit signs? Imagine people on roads driving at 200 mph and if they don't, they get jailed. In my writings it only leads to chaos, and I don't want to sound pretentious, but even though I am no politician, I think my writings are correct. :O

Ok, ok, I suppose most people don't consider me a regular person, BUT I wouldn't want the country to be run by the vast majority of people I know, either. Not because they're bad people but because they're simply not qualified. Take my dad for example, he's an engineer. He may be good with his hands, but what would he say in a meeting with Donald Trump? Maybe 'hello, want me to change your lightbulbs?' A great conversation starter, but after that, things would go downhill. My brother works for a mobile phone company and my sister in law is a nurse. Perfectly respectable professions, but how would they handle the tube strikes England has been getting for a while, now? My brother could tell them how to communicate with each other better, perhaps even worsening the problem and his wife could argue that she needs the money more as nurses have been on strike, too. Still though, they'd handle it better than me, as I'd have to explain I'd want their money simply to buy nice things for myself. THAT would worsen the problem.

I've just Googled the most normal person in the world (i.e. the most regular) and the guy that came up was a 28 year old dude from China. Chinese people are known for being clever, but what's he doing running England? It's like me saying I'm one of the most normal people in the mentally ill community at least, I can kinda write passable techno music maybe, and I'd like to be the president of Japan. How's that going to go down? Even if I was trained in politics, would I get the job? Probably not. Therefore we can conclude that effective governments have very little to do with being normal and should only hire staff who are SUITABLE FOR THE JOB. In comparison, would a politician make a good daycare worker for children? Would the child feel truly cared for, or would the politician keep trying to persuade the toddler that the budget is completely fair? It's not what a child of that age needs. In fact, as such a concept is so hard to grasp by someone so young, you can guarantee the child is going to grow into a person who feels kinda stupid. I'm just saying there isn't a single person who is suited to every line of work.

You know who I'd REALLY hate to be a politician? Harold Shipman. At least he's normal in the world of serial killers, right? If that doesn't prove normality isn't always good, I don't know what does. God knows what his policies would have been. Maybe 'kill everyone'. At least it would be good population control? Actually I'd argue that zero people being alive would take things way too far. Well it's either zero or one, the one person being Harold. I don't know where he'd go from there, he'd probably kill all the animals. Idiot. Google says the average Brit drinks three cups of tea a day. You REAAAALLY don't want me to govern the country if I'm drinking that much of the stuff, as we all know that caffeine drives me mad. Wow. I can't even begin to imagine the kind of stuff I'd be saying. Maybe I'd be responding to the hallucinations which in the past for me personally, have largely been random words. Say I hear the word 'biscuit'. Would you think it's appropriate if I either ban or force people to eat biscuits? No! And on that insightful note... bye!