

The other day, a small bottle of Fanta on my passenger seat (that I didn't strap up) triggered my car's no seat belt warning, who weighs as much as a bottle of Fanta? You'd think it would be triggered by an object weighing at least a stone or so. One stone babies I mean, not adults. That sounds like a needless thing to clear up but maybe not, as things are about to get even weirder: On the gym's cycling machine computer it suggested that a previous user only weighed 40 lbs, because members enter their details (or try to) just before exercising and the details get saved until another member updates the settings, the member in this case being me! That weight isn't quite as extreme as the drink, but do you know what this suggests, anyway? There are elves out there that are invisible and they like to work out! I'm just saying that if I ever saw a man or woman weighing 40 lbs, it would definitely stick in my mind. Men and women can't be invisible, so... it's elves! It's proof coming from a place you wouldn't really expect, no? I think that makes things even better. It's like seeing Jesus's face on a slice of pepperoni! I can see the headlines now: 'Gym user proves the existence of supernatural beings by noticing strange exercise bike settings!' Not the catchiest headline in the world but it doesn't matter as its weirdness pulls you in! The detail of the writing makes it more believable too, if the headliner was just 'Elves in Gym!' no one would take it seriously! It could also suggest a journalist LSD scandal.

Google says elves are usually invisible to humans but they CAN reveal themselves, so keep your eye out. Unless it's really easy to be invisible, maybe? In the Lord of the Rings, you just need to wear a ring, that's very easy. Well for most people, I'm sure I'd find a way of losing it. There was one time I was in a bit of a daze and I lost where I parked my car. :(Turns out I parked it in a place that was different than usual, as the old place was temporarily not in service, whoops. I found it in the end though, which is something. There was another time I meant to drive home, but I ended up in weird town I've never been to instead. Again, whoops. If it IS easy for elves to be invisible, maybe try spotting mythical creatures that stand out more? My recommendations are cyclopes and centaurs. Oh wow, the internet also says elves weigh between 110 - 145 lbs. That means the poor elf at the gym hasn't been eating properly! How sad is that? Self-conscious elves? Maybe that's why they choose to be invisible, it doesn't necessarily mean they're shifty like I presumed, earlier. It also means I can be an elf as I weigh 130 lbs and that could explain my weird ears! However, never in my life have I ever felt invisible. I have felt magical though, but that was only because I had schizophrenia as we all know. As I'm bang in the middle of 110 to 145 lbs, that means I'm a classic elf!

Changing the subject a little, the weather is getting warmer and judging by prior Springs and Summers, I'd expect to have a depressed mood right now. I'm not actually feeling that bad! Not perfect, not that bad. There are three theories: 1. I will get worse soon. 2. It's a result of my conscious realisation that it's better to be more stable than up and down (super mature, no?) 3. It's because my computer has stopped crashing during its updates. Have I said that before? Well whatever the case, it's not as bad as losing your car. To give you an idea of how I feel, I suggest listening to 'Sister' by Creed. It sounds KINDA depressing but it's actually in a major key! Spot on, right there. I hope people don't refer to me as a girl, though. (I know they do). Now what do say? Oh here's an interesting question: How much do pixies weigh? Maybe that's the creature that was on the cycling machine? 4 to 7 pounds? Ah. Not a pixie then. Unless it's morbidly obese, maybe? If so, a good reason to work out! Let's find out if they're invisible, too. Yes, but apparently it takes more effort for them to be invisible than elves. Interesting stuff. Google also says that pixies 'are not CONSIDERED scientifically real' but who knows if you can't see them? Simple logic right there and on that powning note... Bye!