

Simon: Hello! Another interview so soon? You have new things on your mind already?

Simon: Yes, two!

Simon: Is that enough?

Simon: I have no idea. Let's find out. Anyway, I mentioned a while ago how a graffiti artist in central London kept writing 'Eggs!' and painting pictures of the things everywhere. Well, when watching terrorist TV drama Trigger Point, the graffiti was there in plain sight!

Simon: He's made it...

Simon: He sure has. Now millions of people can see how much the guy loves eggs.

Simon: I'm happy for him.

Simon: Me too. I wonder if he anything else to say...

Simon: Hm. Maybe beans?

Simon: Yes! Toast could work, too. If he wants to challenge himself, he could combine all three...

Simon: I guess if he gets too adventurous and hard working he could be easier to catch.

Simon: Then no one will ever know how much he loves eggs, again.

Simon: I wonder if eggs and terrorism have anything in common...

Simon: The only thing I can think of is you have to be careful around terrorists and eggs.

Simon: Because eggs are fragile?

Simon: Yep.

Simon: So you'd call terrorists fragile?

Simon: Suicide bombers are...

Simon: Maybe it's best we stop talking about terrorists. Keep it light.

Simon: Of course. So, observation number two!: In the London Comedy Writers meetings, there is always a pot to give donations. However, in the last get together, those who donated in the past were given loads of free Toblerones to enjoy. Why save up all that money and then just give it all away again?

Simon: Huh.

Simon: If there are no more meetings, that's the reason. All the funds were spent on chocolate... It's an addiction.

Simon: Is giving away chocolate an addiction, though?

Simon: Buying it is, at least. Maybe the buyer first wanted all the treats for himself, then realised it would be unhealthy, so he gave them all away at the last minute...

Simon: I know he feels, but the buying kind of sounds like a manic episode to me...

Simon: Creative people are often bipolar.

Simon: So the meeting leader experienced an upsetting event, he went mad, bought loads of Toblerones to comfort himself, then when he recovered he gave them all away?

Simon: There you go.

Simon: He sounds mental.

Simon: I know. Very sad.

Simon: What do you think should happen to him if he's hospitalised?

Simon: I take over?

Simon: And that's making things better?

Simon: No, but I'm certainly not the kind of person to give things away, so...

Simon: Fair point. Maybe you could take things further?

Simon: Steal from people you mean?

Simon: Errr... Maybe just kindly ask for more money?

Simon: Ok. I have a third idea!

Simon: Yes?

Simon: Guess how many numbers I can signal with just one hand?

Simon: Five?

Simon: Nope, fifteen! By using Roman numerals! There's I, II, III, all very doable. IV is a bit tricky, but with practice, the rewards are there. Then there's...

Simon: Ok, I get the point. What about if you use Arabic numbers? How many numbers could you signal then?

Simon: I don't know. I mean, there's 1, 11, 111, 1,111... Twos are VERY difficult...

Simon: Stick to pen and paper?

Simon: But how could I signal numbers to those far away?

Simon: Throw the paper at them.

Simon: In windy weather?

Simon: Of course. You win.

Simon: Yes!

Simon: But most people today use mobile phones...

Simon: But not ALL the time.

Simon: Of course. You win again.

Simon: :D

Simon: Did you celebrate your niece's birthday recently?

Simon: My dad did, but he left without me. :S

Simon: Oh.

Simon: So now I'll be seeing her later with everyone.

Simon: Do you know when, exactly?

Simon: Nope.

Simon: I see.

Simon: I have another idea!

Simon: Go on...

Simon: When booking a doctor's appointment online, I was told to select my age. Interestingly, I had the option of saying I was born this year...

Simon: Wow. Very impressive if some babies can fill out forms, but really they should be enjoying life rather than studying so intensely.

Simon: Exactly. I guess some people have pushy parents.

Simon: There must be significant plus sides, though...

Simon: Famous baby.

Simon: Yep.

Simon: It makes you wonder what the infant could do when he or she gets older...

Simon: Exactly. Of course spying on people is inappropriate, but I would genuinely love to see how the baby works.

Simon: Right. Maybe later on in life it could do the best kung fu moves ever known...

Simon: I was going to say it could be a chess super grand master, but no, kung fu is better.

Simon: Is it too late to make a 'you must think I was born yesterday' pun?

Simon: It is a bit late, yes.

Simon Darn.

Simon: Has anything annoyed you recently?

Simon: I never celebrated the palindrome date 22nd February, 2022, I kind of just ignored it. At the time, I knew the date was pretty cool, I just didn't appreciate how rare it was.

Simon: Maybe do a late celebration?

Simon: No. The moment's gone.

Simon: You must have something else to look forward to?

Simon: I'm getting a pizza on Saturday.

Simon: Oh here we go...

Simon: I'm not getting potato tots with my pizza though, as I eat them almost every day from the local petrol station.

Simon: Good?

Simon: So good. Does the fact we've started talking about pizza again, mean we should end this interview?

Simon: Sounds about right to me.

Simon: But then what should I do?

Simon: Another album review? Point out how its track names are amusing? Make a story out of the track names? The usual stuff, basically.

Simon: No, I couldn't...

Simon: You'll be fine.

Simon: Ok. Byeeee!